Death-plunge fears rise as council backs ‘sport’

A GYMNASTIC urban craze which can involve jumping off buildings and leaping between rooftops has been officially recognised as a new sport and welcomed by Westminster City Council.

Although at least 10 youngsters died in horrific falls while practising parkour, or freerunning, the UK has become the first country in the world to officially give it sport status – and sports minister Tracey Crouch urged “give it a go”.

A demonstration of parkour

But as the sport is introduced into schools and is being keenly encouraged by the Westminster authorities, fears are growing that young Londoners will be putting their life at risk.

The Home Country Sports Council last week approved Parkour UK’s application for recognition of the sport.

And Mrs Crouch and Sebastian Foucan, president of Parkour UK, announced the formal recognition at LEAP Parkour Park, England’s largest outdoor parkour facility at the Westminster Academy.

The park was launched by Westminster City Council in partnership with Parkour UK in 2012.

“Parkour, also known as freerunning, is the non-competitive physical discipline of training to move freely over and through any terrain using only the abilities of the body, principally through running, jumping, climbing and quadrupedal movement,” said a spokesman for Westminster City Council.

“In practice it focuses on developing the fundamental attributes required for such movement, which include functional strength and fitness, balance, spatial awareness.”

Council tax frozen for second year running

 Borough’s residents ‘set to be among only people in country not to face rising bills’

BY JACK DIXON

COUNCIL-TAX bills will be frozen in Hammersmith and Fulham for a second successive year, town-hall bosses have confirmed.

The commitment not to lift the charge comes despite huge cuts to local-authority budgets.

Residents in Hammersmith and Fulham are set to be among the only people in the country who won’t face rising bills this year, according to councillors.

Most councils are set to hike ratepayer is set to be frozen at £727.81 at a meeting next month. Total bill will be just over £1,000 once the Greater London Authority precept is added to the charge.

John O’Connell, chief executive of the Taxpayers’ Alliance, welcomed the move and said frozen bills would ease the burden on hard-pressed families.

But Conservative councillors argued the Labour administration had not gone far enough to reduce bills. Cllr Greg Smith, leader of the Conservatives, said: “Having said they would cut tax, Labour’s efforts are proving pathetic compared to the Conservatives’ record of cutting council-tax bills by 20 per cent between 2006 and 2014. “Residents will rightly see their council tax as a complete rip-off compared to nearby Wandsworth and Westminster.”

I should have left school at 14, admits plumbing magnate

Most nine-year-old boys spend their days dreaming of life as an astronaut or racing driver, a doctor, policeman or musician. But Charlie Mullins wanted to be a plumber.

Even though he was barely beyond the playground, the now business tycoon and founder of iconic London firm Pimlico Plumbers knew there was money in the pipes waiting to be made.

Idolising his local fix-it man who – it seemed to Charlie, at least – led a life of great luxury and wealth, he began bunking off school.

But rather than skipping classes to pop down to the sweet shop or run off for a kickabout in the park, the young Charlie was earning two bob a day helping to bodge sinks, tubs and toilets.

When he left school with no qualifications at the age of 15 – he admits this was a big mistake, he should have left at 14 – little did he know he would go on to become one of Britain’s most respected businessmen.

After completing a four-year apprenticeship in the trade, Charlie found himself a second-hand van and a bag of tools.

In 1979, he started Pimlico Plumbers from the basement of a Central London estate agent. His vision was simple. “I set out to change the image of the plumbing industry and get rid of the stigma associated with it,” he recalls. “ Plumbers who turn up late driving rusty old vans, not wearing uniform, arses hanging out of their trousers, bad workmanship and ripping off the customer.”

Charlie gradually built a formidable plumbing empire and the business now ranks as London’s biggest independent plumbing and service company.

With a workforce of more than 390 people and a £35 million turnover, Charlie has used his celebrity to attract some of the biggest names around – Simon Cowell, Daniel Craig and even Sir Richard Branson are said to be Pimlico clients.

Notoriously ‘to the point’, his business model is built on keeping things simple. His mantra is to do “the right job at the right price at the right time” for the customer.

But he puts a premium on hiring the right people and ensuring everyone is “drinking out of the same teapot”.

“The way I run my business isn’t rocket science, it’s common sense,” he explains. “The only problem is that common sense ain’t that common.”

Despite keeping a close eye on the day-to-day running of the firm, Charlie – now in his early 60s – has used his notoriety to campaign for change in the industry.

As patron of Women On The Tools – an initiative to encourage stronger female representation in plumbing – he has been at the forefront of changing the perception of tradespeople.

And with his involvement in last week’s #MicrolabMatterDay social-media appeal, he continues to support young entrepreneurs who hope one day to follow in his footsteps.

“I’ve been fortunate enough to be in the position to be able to put something back into society by helping others,” he says. “The work that all the charities carry out is amazing and so many people in need benefit from them, which is very inspiring for everyone.”

SADIQ Khan is being urged to ditch support for the Garden Bridge as spiralling costs raise fears that the tree-lined project could be falling down.

The call for the Mayor of London to “put the whole sorry saga to an end” came after trustees of the bridge warned it cannot be guaranteed as a “going concern”.

However, the Garden Bridge Trust, the charity behind the planned bridge between Temple and the South Bank, says it still aims to go ahead and building will start later this year.

The Trust has revealed that a series of delays mean that costs are expected to “substantially exceed” the approved £185 million.

The Trust’s long-delayed accounts, published last week, show it spent just over £26 million in pre-construction costs during the 17 months covered by the figures, 80 per cent of which came from public money via Transport for London (TfL).

But the accounts show that over the same period the Trust raised just £33 million in new private donations for the bridge, which was first suggested by actress Joanna Lumley and is planned to feature 270 trees and thousands of plants.

In its introduction to the accounts, Trust chairman Mervyn Davies warned that the project faced “challenges that must be resolved before construction of the garden bridge can start”.

The challenges include securing final planning consents for the south end of the bridge, securing a guarantee from London authorities for future maintenance costs and raising more private money, including funds that can be spent immediately.

He continued: “Due to the material uncertainties in existence ahead of finalising these accounts, trustees are unable to conclude that the trust is a going concern, and therefore it only appropriate to flag these risks in this report.”

Now Caroline Pidgeon, the Liberal Democrat member of the London Assembly, is calling on the Mayor of London to scrap the Garden Bridge project.

“Even advocates of the Garden Bridge with rose-tinted glasses will find these accounts incredibly concerning,” said Ms Pidgeon.

“The Trust has finally admitted what most people have long expected was the case - that the final cost of the project is likely to exceed substantially above the current £185 million predicted cost.”

“The Trust is admitting for the second time that the costs of this project are spiralling up wards. That can only increase substantially above the current £185 million predicted cost.”

The proposed Garden Bridge across the Thames would place an apprenticeship opportunity on the doorstep of the city, and the FSB is urging the Government to address skill shortages and encourage a policy of “Permanently relaxed planning rights” - before it becomes a London crisis similar to Housing,” said a FSB spokesman.

The Government should also create an increased inner and outer London small business rate relief threshold that reflects the specific problems faced by small businesses in the capital. In inner London we are calling for the threshold to be £20,000 rateable value for 100 per cent relief tapering to £9,000.

“It is only fair that businesses in London which are duty bound to disclose these risks and uncertainties in existence ahead of finalising these accounts, are duty bound to disclose these risks and uncertainties in existence ahead of finalising these accounts, and feel it only appropriate to flag these risks in this report.”

The Government needs to reconsider its policy of relaxing the conversion of office space to residential space through permitted development rights – before it becomes a London crisis similar to Housing,” said a FSB spokesman.

Sixty two per cent of apprentices to date have been from non white-British backgrounds and 27 per cent have a disability, most hidden.

The programme was also effective in reaching people from socio-economic backgrounds that are significantly under represented in the theatre workforce, to reach and train young people from backgrounds that are currently underrepresented in the theatre sector.

As well as college and workplace training to-date, the LTC itself.

“We worked really hard to find talented young people who we don’t usually hear from when we are recruiting.”

“Most everyone working in the arts will say at some point that they owe their position to someone who saw something in them and believed in them. That’s brilliant if you’re there to be ‘spotted’ but impossible if you’d never find yourself in that position in the first place.”

“We decided we needed to be proactive and to go out and find talent and potential – and we found it.”

Sam Maynard, education manager of Donmar Warehouse, added: “Working with apprentices makes me question a lot of practice that is taken as read within the organisation, and I think that is a really good thing for the culture of an organisation.”

Sian Alexander, Executive Director of the Lyric Hammersmith, said: “The cultural sector is a real UK success story in terms of growth and economic development and London is one of the most multi-cultural cities in the world, yet the workforce of the theatre sector is still under-representative of London’s diversity.

From the start, we have seen this collaborative programme as an important way to diversify the workforce, to reach and train young people from backgrounds that are currently underrepresented in the theatre sector.

Working together has been key to this. I don’t think the London theatres could have embraced apprenticeships on the scale that they have, and with the success they have, if it hadn’t been for that collaborative approach, as part of the London Theatre Consortium.

Although the funding climate makes it harder now, we are committed to continuing to work together to maintain the momentum we have achieved and ensure more access and accessible opportunities for talented young people from all backgrounds in our theatres.”

Recruitment for the fourth year of apprenticeships has now begun, with apprenticeships starting in March 2017. More details are available from www.londontheatreconsortium.com

Free workshop for filmmakers

HAMMERSMITH United Charities is offering a free filmmaking workshop for budding cinematographers.

Participants will enjoy a masterclass from experts at the production company Rainbow Collective.

The event follows HUC’s successful film festival last year, which encouraged members of the community to make their own moving pictures.

The workshop takes place at Sycamore House on Friday January 27 between 1 pm and 4 pm. For more information and tickets, visit bit.ly/2icjVJh.

Screen-staring takes 117 days

PEOPLE living in Hammersmith and Fulham are spending half their leisure time looking at computer or television screens, according to new research.

The average Londoner will spend 117 days a year staring at screens – compared to only four days exercising.

The findings came from a survey commissioned by furniture company Distinctive Chesterfields.

It also found that Londoners were the least social people in the UK, skipping around one in three social events in favour of time in front of the television.

TV star sparks row on internet

TV and radio presenter Jeremy Vine sparked a social-media row after posting video footage of a road-rage incident online.

More than 200 comments were left on the broadcaster’s Facebook page in relation to the clip, which showed a near miss between a cyclist and a motorist.

The footage was caught on a camera attached to the presenter’s helmet as he cycled along Hammersmith Road.

Mr Vine, who hosts a weekday show on BBC Radio 2 and is known to cycle to work, was branded a ‘nanny state’ by a comment from a local resident.

Walking tour

A HAMMERSMITH musician and David Bowie fan is organising special tours to commemorate the singer’s life.

Nick Stephenson launched the tours in Bowie’s hometown Brixton last week, coinciding with the first anniversary of the pop star’s death.

The tours, on Wednesdays, Fridays and Sundays, guide visitors through the landmarks of Bowie’s life.

Craven Cottage 10k returns

FITNESS fanatics and charity fundraisers will be strapping on their running shoes to take part in the Craven Cottage 10k race next month.

Fulham Football Club has confirmed that the annual winter event is due to take place on February 26.

Ex-Whites hero Sean Davis will return to his former stomping ground to fire the starting gun.

The runners will head off from Craven Cottage before crossing Hammersmith Bridge, looping around Wandsworth and back along the south bank of the Thames.

Competitors then cross Putney Bridge and trek through Bishop’s Park before finishing back in the grounds of the stadium.

All proceeds from the event are going towards the Fulham FC Foundation to support its various community projects.

Paving-stone memorial to First World War hero

BY JACK DIXON

TRIBUTES will be paid to a “remarkable” Hammersmith soldier who was honoured for his bravery on the battlefield 100 years ago.

A unique ceremony is to be held in memory of First World War hero L/Sgt Frederick Palmer next month.

Palmer was awarded the Victoria Cross for his courageous efforts in the face of unimaginable horrors on the front line.

In the midst of the conflict in northern France, Palmer gathered a small team of comrades and stonied an enemy trench.

Despite losing all the senior officers in his company to machine-gun fire, the 25-year-old took command and held the captured trench against wave after wave of enemy attacks.

Palmer, who was born in Hammersmith on November 11 1891, was presented with the military’s highest honour for gallantry – one of nine medals he received during a distinguished career.

Records reveal that Palmer was praised for his “very conspicuous bravery” on the battlefield.

The King’s citation, read at the ceremony, said: “His splendid determination and devotion to duty undoubtedly averted what might have proved a serious disaster.”

A century on from his death-defying heroics, Palmer is to be recognised once again.

The mayor of Hammersmith and Fulham, Cllr Mercy Umem, will lead a special service marking the 100th anniversary of the battle.

A paving stone is to be laid at the Shepherd’s Bush war memorial on Shepherd’s Bush Green in Palmer’s memory.

Several members of Palmer’s family, including his son and grandson, are expected to attend the ceremony on February 17 – 100 years to the day since his extraordinary act of bravery.

Cllr Alan De’Ath, Hammersmith and Fulham’s representative for the Armed Forces, paid special tribute to Palmer last week.

He said: “The bravery that L/Sgt Palmer showed on that battlefield a century ago still resonates today.”

“It is humbling to remember the selfless valour he displayed and it is fitting that we pause to pay tribute to a remarkable man and to express our gratitude to all those who have died defending our country and our freedom.”

After the First World War, Palmer joined the Royal Flying Corps before moving to Malaya in the 1930s to set up a planting business.

He returned to Hampshire in 1950 and died in 1955, leaving a widow, three sons and a daughter.

The memorial service takes place on Shepherd’s Bush Green on Friday February 17 at 11am.

Mental-health plans ‘huge opportunity’ for improved lives

AMBIOUS new plans to overhaul the mental-health system have created a “huge opportunity” to improve the lives of thousands of people in Hammersmith and Fulham, according to NHS bosses.

Experts said a government drive to tackle mental illness could pave the way for a “step change” in quality of care.

But health chiefs also warned that the NHS alone could not tackle the problem and that schools, employers and “wider society” all had a role to play.

The comments came from the Cavendish Square Group – the body representing the 10 NHS trusts responsible for mental-health services in London – after Prime Minister Theresa May unveiled the government’s action plan to fight stigma and discrimination within the system.

Mrs May set out proposals to invest an extra £15 million in community care, while improving mental-health training for teachers and employers.

The policy announcement could have a life-changing impact on the two million Londoners – including thousands in Hammersmith and Fulham – who experience mental ill health every year.

The Cavendish Square Group, which includes the West London Mental Health Trust, said it was encouraged by indications that ministers would seek to address services for children and young people.

It also welcomed the government’s proposals to improve workplace conditions and urged ministers to “hold employers to account” where discrimination occurs.

But it warned of historic underfunding of the mental-health system and called for a “sustained commitment to increase resources”.

Crucially, it said the NHS alone could not provide the kind of mental-health services that would be more suitably delivered by schools and employers.

The group said: “We do not underestimate the financial resources needed to deliver a mentally healthy society but it is not all about money.

“We all have a responsibility to work together to build better systems and services to assist people and communities in supporting themselves, and to receive high-quality, safe and responsive services when they need to take time off.”

In her speech, the Prime Minister outlined plans for:

• an extra £15 million for community care services, such as crisis cafés;

• every secondary school to be offered mental-health first-aid training;

• a review of children and adolescent mental-health services;

• additional training for employers to support staff who need to take time off.

The announcement follows a fundraising and awareness campaign by the London Weekly News to raise the profile of mental-health issues.

Under the slogan “Tackling mental health in the capital” the campaign has been shining a light on stigma and inequality within the system, while demonstrating the positive efforts being made to tackle the problems.

Council recognises urban craze as sport

ness, agility, co-ordination, precision, control and creative vision.

Parkour motivates people to get active. Participants can take part in the sport whenever and wherever they want, without needing to meticulously manage their busy diaries, special equipment, join a club, or book a pitch or court. All you need is a pair of trainers and your imagination to #GiveParkourAGo!

Recognition will enable parkour groups and organisations affiliated to Parkour UK to apply to the home-country sports councils for lottery or e-squecher funding to support the development of the sport locally in each home nation.

But the country’s ringing endorsement of parkour failed to mention that many of its teenage enthusiasts, known as traceurs, jump between rooftops and across trains and a worrying number have died after misjudging their leaps – two were aged only 16.

Mrs Crouch did not mention the incidence of parkour deaths at the launch last week, when she said: “I want people to get out there and find the sport and physical activity that is right for them and parkour is certainly a fun, creative and innovative option.

“I am pleased it has been recognised as a sport, giving it the platform for greater growth in this country, with Parkour UK as its governing body. The sport promotes movement and using the great outdoors as a space to get active in and I encourage people to don their trainers and give it a go.”

Mr Foscan said: “This is brilliant recognition for a discipline that started off as child’s play with my friends almost 30 years ago. The beauty of parkour is that everyone, of all ages, can do it re-spectfully in almost any environment. We celebrate activity and playfulness while constantly challenging our mental and physical limits. It is more than just jumping, it is a health-driven way of life.”

Parkour has proved a health-driven way of life for some.

In Russia in 2012 a 24-year-old woman fell 17 storeys to her death during her first parkour session.

In Russia in 2013 a student plunged from 26 floors to his death in an accident on the Metro. He was reported to be part of the Brownian group, famed for the practice of train-surfing – jumping between the tops of trains. His friends have insisted that he was not train-surfing at the time of the tragedy.

Although authorities aim to restrict parkour to schools and purpose-built parks – of which there are now 50 across the UK – critics fear that in London, teenagers will copy the example of peers in other cities and extreme parkour across the city’s rooftops.

Chris McGovern, chairman of Campaign for Real Education and a former Downing Street adviser, said that making parkour an official sport was a barmy idea which would alarm many parents, especially if it is encouraged in schools as a sport.

He said: “We need to promote sports in schools but this is not the answer. I don’t think that parkour should be taught in schools.

“Is it all right for students to do and I’m not concerned about that fact that doesn’t relate to a school environment. There are concerns about parkour because it involves children being caught jumping between metro trains and jumping off roof-tops and imitating them. It’s intimidating for other people who are not doing it.”

Mr McGovern said he was most concerned that if parkour is accepted in schools as a sport it could kill team-play as youngsters turn from football and rugby to the new craze which is all about the individual.

He said: “Introducing parkour into schools is a great idea. Schools won’t encourage kids to do train-surfing – that is what it leads to.”

Despite the safety fears, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents is not alarmed about the spread of parkour.

David Walker, leisure safety manager at RoSPA, said: “Parkour, just like climbing, mountain biking and other activities that encourage exploration, is inherently risky. But with the right measures in place and proper assessment of those risks, it can be undertaken in an environment that is as safe as necessary to prevent serious injuries. Having parkour recognised as a sport, with the establishment of a governing body, will help achieve this.

“Stunts such as train-surfing and jumping between tall buildings are not, according to parkour experts, considered part of the sport.”

Official parkour organisations are also keen to calm fears of parents. On the one hand, they want to ensure that their parks and stunts are safe and that traceurs do their regular training.

The more we practise parkour, the more prepared our bodies become for real-life obstacles.

A spokesman for Westminster Council said: “Parkour UK works closely with partners to encourage and develop the sport, making appropriate public discourse of parkour. The organisation also works with local groups, organisations, national organisations, local authorities and communities. Parkour UK has forged a close relationship with the education sector, developing programmes for improving literacy and photography and cross-curricular links around the history and culture of the sport.”

Chief executive at Parkour UK, Eugene Minogue, said: “Parkour has come a long way since first arriving in the UK in 2003. Parkour is now in the top four of the majority of primary and secondary schools, colleges and universities all over the UK.”

He New Year started well for the big retailers, Marks & Spencer, Debenhams and Tesco, who all posted positive Christmas trading statements.

They provide a good indicator for the state of the economy but more attention should be given to the performance of micro businesses, which account for 96 per cent of all registered businesses in the UK.

It’s easy to applaud big business and give them top billing but five million micro businesses, providing 33 per cent of the UK’s total employment, with limited resources, are the real heroes.

Established by entrepreneurial individuals, these businesses, which employ between one and nine people, are crucial to the success of our economy and should be afforded a lot more media coverage and support to help them reach their full potential.

Micro businesses and self-employment are on the up – but as markets become more saturated and big businesses flex their marketing muscles, it has become increasingly difficult for smaller businesses to compete.

In the UK, one in seven people are self-employed but are now earning 20 per cent less than they were in 2008. Therefore, it’s essential to nurture and support these businesses.

One movement that is already well ahead of the curve is #MicroBizMattersDay, which was launched by the Enterprise Rockers in 2015.

It’s an annual, international project, which, this year, took place on Friday and encouraged people to give 13 minutes of their time to help out micro businesses.

It brought together more than one million micro and small business owners using the power of social media and included a physical event, which was broadcast through Google Hangouts, YouTube and Facebook Live.

The event was held at Pimlico Plumbers’ Sail Street headquarters – my contribution to the movement – and enabled micro business owners to interact with and learn from well-known figures, including The Apprentice winner Tim Campbell, MBE, founder of the Enterprise Rockers, and indie label owner Sway and entrepreneur Chris Percival.

During the eight-hour event we discussed important challenges and opportunities facing micro businesses, shared best practice and answered questions from those tuned in, which hopefully gave the entrepreneurs in attendance a better chance of continuing their success.

I know from personal experience the difficulties of growing a business from the ground up, which is why I am so passionate about supporting micro businesses during the most difficult part of a business journey.

It was encouraging to see the passion and innovation that exists in this community – the future certainly looks bright.

More attention needs to be given to support those that are looking to scale-up from modest beginnings.

As I often say, if you are more fortunate than others, it’s better to build a larger table than a taller fence.
Campaigners slam ‘foolish’ plans for NHS

BY JACK DIXON
jack@londonweeklynews.co.uk

Hospital campaigners have slammed “foolish” plans for a shake-up of health services in Hammersmith and Fulham as official figures reveal the huge pressure on A&E services.

The number of A&E visits at Charing Cross Hospital shot up by almost eight per cent last summer compared to the year before.

Stretched response teams also faced a surge in the number of patients arriving by ambulance as well as an even bigger increase in the most serious emergency cases, known as type 1.

Data from the Imperial College Healthcare NHS Trust revealed the extent of the strain at Charing Cross from July to September last year.

Overall, the number of visits to the hospital’s A&E department rose by 7.9 per cent compared to the same period in 2015.

The figures came as a new BBC documentary series, Hospital, exposed the day-to-day pressures facing staff at the trust’s hospitals in north-west London.

Local healthcare campaigners, who fear that Charing Cross Hospital could soon be closed as part of NHS cost-cutting plans, jumped on the figures last week.

Merril Hammer, chairman of the Save Our Hospitals group, said: “A key problem is that there are just not enough beds. Bed occupancy is at record levels – well above what’s recommended. To talk about closing Charing Cross as an acute hospital is just plain irresponsible.”

Cllr Stephen Cowan, leader of Hammersmith and Fulham council, said the Charing Cross A&E had seen a huge rise in demand since the emergency department at nearby Hammersmith Hospital was closed in 2014.

He said: “The plan to close the A&E at Charing Cross is foolish. These figures show how vital it is to the growing population of West London.”

For the month of October; the Imperial trust fell short of the government target to treat 95 per cent of A&E patients within four hours of their arrival at hospital. Only 87 per cent received treatment within the four-hour window.

Last summer, the number of serious type 1 A&E visits increased by 12.5 per cent compared to the same period in 2015.

“The trust has consistently denied that there are plans to close Charing Cross Hospital within the five-year timeframe of the NHS sustainability and transformation plan,” a spokesperson said. “Unfortunately, there are very similar pressures in A&E departments across England.

“The causes are complex and include increasing demand as well as challenges in discharging patients who have completed their hospital treatment but need ongoing care and support at home or in the community.

“We recently gave a public reassurance that there will be no reduction in Charing Cross Hospital’s A&E unless and until we are able to reduce demand through out-of-hospital services, and that any plans must be developed with local communities.

“There is support of Imperial College Healthcare Charity, we are currently making significant improvements to a range of facilities at Charing Cross, including A&E, acute medicine, outpatients and theatres.”

Better care available off-ward for one in three patients – health boss

ONE in three patients occupying hospital beds in West London could be better cared for outside wards, according to a senior health boss.

Professor Tim Orchard, director of medicine and integrated health at the Imperial NHS Trust, said care at home, in rehabilitation units or at nursing homes would be more suitable for many patients.

The trust is responsible for running Charing Cross and Hammersmith hospitals in Fulham, as well as St Mary’s, Queen Charlotte’s and Chelsea, and the Western Eye Hospital.

Prof Orchard made the comments in a blog post after appearing in an episode of the BBC’s new documentary series Hospital, which goes behind the scenes at the trust to uncover the pressures facing the health service.

He said efforts to make hospital services more streamlined were unlikely to be enough to respond fully to “changing needs” in care and treatment. “There’s a growing consensus that the only sustainable solution is to move towards a more integrated health and social care system,” he said.

“We have to make the shift from care being reactive and crisis-driven to actively working to keep people as healthy as possible. Regardless of which bit of the ‘system’ they are in, patients have to feel in control of their own care – and it needs to be joined-up and consistent.”

Motorway death: Police believe man hid in lorry before falling into road

A SHEPHERD’S Bush man died after being struck by several vehicles on a busy motorway.

Ashley Hayes, 46, was found in the middle of the M1 in Northamptonshire last week after suffering “catastrophic” injuries.

Police believe he may have hidden inside a lorry before falling into the road.

Officers leading the investigation say the death could be suspicious and are appealing for witnesses to come forward.

Mr Hayes is thought to have been at Toddington Services in Bedfordshire at around 1.30am on Tuesday January 10 before making the journey.

Less than an hour later, several drivers phoned police to report a body lying on the motorway.

The northbound carriageway between junctions 16 and 17 was closed until around 3pm while forensic teams moved in.

DS Tony Hopkins, of Northamptonshire Police, did not rule out the possibility that Mr Hayes had hidden inside a lorry.

“We need anyone who was there at the time and may have seen him or witnessed anything suspicious to contact us,” he said.

“This may have been an accident or something more serious. We need to determine the circumstances that led to his death.

“There will be lorry drivers and other motorists who may have driven this stretch of road and some of them may have dashcam footage.

“We would urge anyone with information to come forward.”

Police said Mr Hayes may have been knocked down by another vehicle in a ‘fail-to-stop’ collision or that a motorist believed they had hit an animal.

But officers said there was no bridge or footpath nearby that would provide a route for Mr Hayes to walk onto the motorway.

DS Hopkins said: “The particular stretch of road is unlit and there are roadworks restricting the speed limit.

“People wouldn’t expect there to be a pedestrian in the road.”

Mr Hayes’ family have been informed of the death but have declined to comment at this stage.

KENSINGTON and Chelsea Council is inviting residents to its Sloane Street public exhibition to find out more about a project which it claims will reduce the dominance of traffic in the area and create an attractive, high-quality environment.

A spokesman for the authority said: “In partnering with Cadogan as the majority landowner and TfL, the council has an opportunity to improve the public realm not only on borough-controlled roads and pavements but also in areas of the street that are in private ownership.”

Detailed information will be available including a model, videos showing how traffic flows and capacity will be maintained, traffic survey results and other technical information.

Members of the project team will be on hand to discuss the proposed changes and answer any questions.

The exhibition will be held at 129 Sloane Street on the following dates:
- Thursday January 26 from 2pm to 8pm;
- Friday January 27 from 10am to 2pm;
- Saturday January 28 from 10am to 2pm;

Upper school’s maiden play is hailed ‘fantastic’

PUPILS of Portland Place School have been acclaimed for “a fantastic production” – their first upper-school play, Our Country's Good.

The show, held at Theatre Technis, showcased “the very best of pupil talent” at the independent school for those aged eight to 18.

“Parents, staff and pupils were treated to an impressive and entertaining dramatic evening with outstanding performances throughout the cast,” said a spokesman for the school in Westminster.

“This is the first play the Upper School has staged without the involvement of the lower years and it was a huge success.”

Our Country's Good is a classic story about a group of Royal Marines and convicts in a penal colony in New South Wales. While the Royal Marines plan on hanging the prisoners, some of the men from the ship try to find an alternative way to punish the convicts. It is agreed that they will stage a play instead.

“Rehearsals were intensive with the pupils dedicating five hours per week since September to perfect their roles,” said the school spokesman. “They have risen to the challenging of balancing rehearsals with their A-level and GCSE studies and taking part in sports. Their impressive effort and stamina were evident throughout the play.”

David Chivers, head of drama at Portland Place School and the director of the play, said: “It has been great to see the students develop their stage craft and individual performance skills. Full credit goes to them for balancing rehearsals with their school work and sports.”
The phrase of the day is “integrated care” as NHS leaders draw up ever-more ambitious plans to restructure our health service and turn down the heat on front-line staff. But at the coalface, the grind goes on. Bitter January brings a host of new challenges with which many fear our stretched doctors and nurses simply cannot cope.

As we report this week, the number of visits to the A&Es department at Charter Cross Hospital in Birmingham is once again on the rise. And the level of demand shows no signs of slowing down.

While this newspaper has followed the ongoing struggles at our local hospitals for many months, the extent of the pressures facing staff here in West London was broadcast to millions across the country for the first time last week. The BBC’s ground-breaking fly-on-the-wall documentary series Hospital, which aired its first episode on Wednesday, went undercover with the Imperial College NHS Healthcare Trust last autumn.

Its gripping expose of the traumatic, life-changing decisions that staff are making on a daily basis has shone a national spotlight on the challenges that, sadly, we in London know all too well to be true.

In the first episode, television cameras followed the team at the Intensive Care Unit at St Mary’s Hospital as they were forced to postpone an urgent cancer operation to make space for a patient arriving from Norfolk with a ruptured aorta. There were simply not enough beds to accommodate both patients.

“I think we do need more capacity because we’re always under pressure,” said one of the hospital’s senior staff members in a striking admission. “It does feel to me as though the elastic’s a bit nearer to breaking now than it ever was.”

Our treasured healthcare system – which is quite rightly the envy of the world – continues to be the single most emotive political issue on the table.

Here in London we have seen protest after protest, demonstration after demonstration, all in the name of protecting the principles that underpin our proudest national symbol.

We must take time to be thankful for the astonishing work that our dutiful healthcare professionals continue to carry out in what are increasingly becoming impossible circumstances. We owe them our lives.

May’s chance to make a difference

The Prime Minister was right to raise mental health in her speech on the Downing Street steps when she took office in July and we welcome her first significant policy statement on mental health within six months of the start of her government.

Mental health policy and people with mental ill-health have been too often overlooked by successive governments and there is an urgent need for – to use the Prime Minister’s own words – a “step change” in mental health.

In her speech on January 9, Prime Minister May demonstrated her personal commitment to “tackle the burning injustice of mental health care”. She has a huge opportunity to make a transformative difference to the mental health, life chances and well-being of the two million Londoners who experience some form of mental ill-health every year, and to many millions more across the country.

The Prime Minister is right to focus on children and young people. We have long known that early intervention in mental health is critical to its effective management and treatment, and providing extra training for teachers is a good proposal. Yet with less money coming from local authorities in early intervention, it is important this gap is filled by central government.

The NHS has seen a four-fold increase in referrals for children and young people’s services. It is likely that some of This is due to the contraction in local authority-provided services.

More work in schools will also be vital in destigmatising mental illness and encouraging a prevention-led approach, creating the conditions and behaviours to grow more resilient, mental-health-friendly environments and communities, and tackle ill-health early, before it becomes entrenched and clinically problematic.

It is important to note, however, that the previous government already set aside specific funding for children and young people’s mental health – but systemic challenges in how money in the NHS is allocated means we also need to see an immediate focus on ensuring the already-promised money actually reaches the front line.

The Prime Minister should also be aware that tackling stigma will inevitably lead to more people entering the system seeking help. This vital effort must therefore come in hand in hand with a sustained commitment to increase resources. The lack of equality of investment in mental health is itself a symbol of the stigma surrounding mental illness.

Mental health provision must also better reflect changing times and we welcome the Prime Minister paying attention to digital solutions for enabling quicker consultation and diagnosis.

Important, too, is the attention given by the Prime Minister to mental health in the workplace. The working environment can be a major contributor to mental health crisis – but, equally, can be an essential support to those with mental ill-health. The government should encourage all employers to tackle stigma and create positive working environments and hold them to account if discrimination does occur.

We are delighted that the Prime Minister is recognising the importance of cross-societal, multi-agency approaches to mental health and we fully endorse this. The NHS alone cannot provide what should best be carried out from schools, by employers, at home and in wider society.

The report of the Mental Health Taskforce, and the government’s endorsement of it, represents a huge opportunity to improve the mental health of London and the nation. We are delighted that London’s mayor has, like the Prime Minister, made mental health a priority and we continue to support Saadiq Khan in this.

We appreciate the increased transparency NHS England has introduced on spending, access and outcomes, and hope this will lead to significant improvements. However, what is also needed is a very careful assessment of the two-year NHS contracts about to be applied – they must ensure that the mental health minimum investment standard is adhered to. We will be monitoring this very carefully.

We do not underestimate the financial resources needed to deliver a mentally healthy society but it is not all about money – we all have a responsibility to work together to build better systems and services and to assist people and communities in supporting themselves and to receive high-quality, safe and responsive services when they need them.

How will council sort this problem?

CONGRATULATIONS to all those recipients in the New Year’s Honours list (London Weekly News, January 10) for their hard work in the unfashionable area of mental health.

While this is a small reward for their extraordinary work and dedication for many years, there is much still to be done by others.

As a councillor and former chairman of Hammersmith and Fulham Mind, I know the hardships that people go through in order to deal with their own personal issues before trying to find a warm and caring service to help them deal with their day-to-day lives.

I am heartened to read that Theresa May is now recognising the crisis in this area, especially since mental-health issues do affect 20 per cent of the population. It is unfortunately an ever-increasing problem that desperately needs targeted funding.

Given the council is now making it a priority, what is Hammersmith and Fulham council going to be doing in order to help provide assistance for those living and working in the borough?

They have been paying lip service to those who are in dire need of assistance for years.

What constructive measures are they going to put in place in order to help address this problem? Or do we have to wait until the next council elections for them to address the issue in their party manifesto?

People with mental-health issues matter whether they vote or not.

Mayor has broken another promise

ORDINARY working Londoners faced more misery as mayor of London Sadiq Khan delivered his third broken promise in less than a week.

After welcoming Londoners back to work last week with a fares increase and abandoning his commitment to have 32,000 police officers on the capital’s streets, the Labour mayor broke another flagship promise to deliver “zero days of strikes”.

During his campaign last year, the “mayor for all Londoners” pledged to “stop strikes for Underground”, yet he’s already broken his promise to ordinary working people are paying the price.

Memorials of the Labour-supporting RMT and TSSA unions staged a 24-hour strike from 6pm last Sunday (January 8) to 10.30pm Monday bringing chaos to the capital and holding Londoners to ransom.

Fears that his failure will drain London’s economy of more than £3,000 per second.

The cost of Tube strikes to London’s economy is estimated to be £300 million a day, equivalent to 10,732 new police constables being trained and paid for a year.

Mr Khan’s “zero strikes” promise amounts to all the others’ not worth the paper it is written on. Like all Labour politicians, he’s powerless while in the pocket of his union paymasters. His manifestos already reads like a litany of broken promises, and it is ordinary working Londoners who are paying the price.

Club so great for green light

MORE than a year ago, a planning application for a new stadium at Stamford Bridge with an expanded seating capacity for 52,000 fans was submitted to our local council, Hammersmith and Fulham.

Over the past 12 months we have consulted widely with local residents, local businesses, statutory authorities and continued to work closely with the club.

On Wednesday, the council’s planning committee considered the application and we are grateful that planning permission was granted for the redevelopment of our historic home.

The committee decision does not mean that work can begin on site.

This is just the latest, although significant, sign that we have to take before we can commence work, including obtaining various other permissions.

We will continue to inform you about progress throughout this process. Thank you for your continued support.

Coffee shop now centre for learning

COFFEE shops have become popular meeting places for on-the-go Londoners – the perfect spot for a working lunch or a business briefing.

But one entrepreneur now hopes to turn Hammersmith’s cafes into hubs for learning.

New evening courses will be available at Costa shops from this month, offering tuition for GCSE English and a diploma in health and social care. The educational initiative is the brainchild of Jason Elsom, a University of Cambridge graduate who is aiming to launch hundreds of evening classes at coffee houses all over the country.

His company – PopUp College – has teamed up with the international coffee chain in an attempt to “fill the gap” in adult education left by local authorities’ cutbacks.

Starting this month, aspiring students will have the chance to take part in weekly evening classes at the Hammersmith branch.

The English lessons are taking place alongside GCSE science classes in Romford and A-level maths lessons in Whitechapel, while business skills are being taught in Ilford. One branch in Putney is even providing language courses in Italian.

Mr Elsom said the programme is targeting adult students who feel uncomfortable about returning to the classroom. “At a time when adult education is under threat, we wanted to give people the chance to come in one night a week and learn a new skill, have some fun and socialise at the same time,” he said.

“The Costa store creates a welcoming environment for adults who want to learn but who are put off by the idea of a traditional college classroom,” he added.

Mr Elsom was inspired to launch the scheme after a career switch of his own. He began his working life in the technology sector, before retraining as a teacher and taking a leadership role within the field, he now works on a range of educational initiatives with private-sector partners.

Since launching PopUp College in 2015, the business has grown to encompass more than 50 locations and 240 courses.

Sandy Gourlay, the company’s charity and community manager, said: “We are delighted to support Jason and PopUp College with this exciting new initiative to create accessible courses to engage adults in education and teach people new skills.”

Local schools among the best

SCHOOLS in Hammersmith and Fulham have performed above the national average once again, according to official figures.

The number of students achieving the key measure of five GCSEs including a C or above in English and maths reached 66.9 per cent last year. The figure was almost seven per cent above the national average for state schools – 62.6 per cent.

Provisional statistics for 2016 released by the Department for Education revealed the borough’s positive academic performance.

Among the highest-achieving schools were the London Oratory School, Lady Margaret School and Sacred Heart High School.

More than 85 per cent of pupils at each of the three schools achieved the benchmark score last year.

Around 61 per cent of children at the borough’s primary schools met expected standards, compared to 53 per cent nationwide.

The London Oratory School again recorded the most impressive results, with St Stephen’s, Normand Croft, St Andrew’s and St Augustine’s also performing well.

The figures also revealed that 93 per cent of the borough’s school leavers in 2014 remained in education or employment after completing their schooling.

Fresh appeal for information after stabbing

POLICE have launched a fresh appeal for information after a 14-year-old boy was stabbed in a Hammersmith park.

The teenager was knifed in Ravenscourt Park on Thursday January 5 before jumping a locked gate and staggering to a bus stop in Goldhawk Road.

Officers have arrested a 13-year-old boy in connection with the investigation and he has been released on bail while inquiries continue.

The usually quiet and peaceful park was turned into a crime scene overnight as forensic teams and police dogs moved in to investigate the stabbing.

Ambulance crews treated the boy at the scene before he was taken to hospital in a stable condition.

The incident prompted Hammersmith MP Andy Slaughter to raise concerns about safety.

Local councillors also called for witnesses to come forward.

Met detectives have renewed their appeals for help with the case, almost two weeks on from the stabbing.

Anyone who can assist with the investigation is asked to call officers on 101 or contact the Met Police Twitter account @MetCC.

It is understood officers were focusing their investigation on a playground inside the park known to be a meeting place for young people.

Khan to pump £1.5m more into homes scheme

LONDON mayor Sadiq Khan has set out plans to pump an extra £1.5 million into the development of new homes at Old Oak Common.

The mayor's draft budget for 2017-18 includes a financial boost for the huge regeneration project.

Under the plans, a total of £7.3 million will go to the Old Oak and Park Royal Development Corporation – up from £5.8 million last year – to help it push forward with the project.

The corporation is seeking to create tens of thousands of new homes and jobs on the site, which straddles the northern end of Hammersmith and Fulham.

Outlining his draft budget last week, the mayor said: "I believe Old Oak and Park Royal is one of the capital's most important regeneration projects."

The previous mayor inflated last year's OPDC budget by allocating a one-off payment of £8 million to the organisation.

"Taking that into account, I am, in fact, proposing to increase the development corporation's budget compared to what the London Assembly agreed last year," the budget sets out plans to hold a further £1 million in reserve, pending a proposal for extra investment in the area.

Royal College of Art set for White City

BY JACK DIXON

HUNDREDS of the world's most promising young artists and designers will make the move to White City this year as one of London's leading universities opens a new campus in Hammersmith and Fulham.

The Royal College of Art has announced plans to launch a complex for architecture, humanities and communication at the revamped BBC Television Centre. It will place one of the world’s premier art and design institutions at the heart of White City’s new creative quarter following a £4 billion redevelopment.

The 4,000 square metre building is set to bring more than 700 staff and students into the borough when the autumn term begins in September.

"Townhall chiefs welcomed the announcement last week as a major boost for the borough's young people who dream of a career in the arts."

"The RCA becomes the latest high-profile institution to make the move to White City after fashion giant Yoox Net-a-Porter confirmed plans for a new tech hub in the area last autumn."

"The university's schools of communication and humanities will also make a permanent switch to West London, with new architecture programmes also in the pipeline at White City."

Bosse also said the new campus would retain close links with the RCA's design, fine art and fashion hubs in Kensington and Battersea.

"We are determined to be the best place to do business in Europe - and a vibrant arts scene helps us do just that."

The former BBC Television Centre is due to reopen at the end of this year with new offices, flats, restaurants and a hotel. A total of £8 billion is being spent on the 15-year regeneration of White City, providing 20,000 new jobs.

‘There was nowhere for my son to go to for help’

For more than eight years Doreen High felt unable to talk about her son Ricky’s tragic death. While he wrestled with complex mental health problems, she felt lost, alone and powerless to help him. In an exclusive interview with London Weekly News reporter Jack Dixon as part of our Change Is Possible campaign, Doreen tells her story for the first time.

When Doreen High was told her son had been sectioned, it was the best news she could have hoped to receive.

“I thought, thank God for that,” she recalls. “I had been worried for his own safety but now I knew he was going to get some treatment.”

Doreen had never fully understood what was wrong with Ricky. From an early age he had endured spells of depression and struggled with Deliriria, and during his later teenage years his behaviour had become increasingly erratic.

“He and people were following him and there were cameras in his flat watching him,” Doreen explains.

“And he kept on about this conspiracy, that someone was going to come and kill him. He was really frustrated as his mental health problems came and go for help.”

From an early age he had endured psychotic voices, that someone was going to come and kill him. He believed he was part of the conspiracy, that someone was going to come to kill him. He believed there were cameras in the flat, that the voices were the stuff of fantasy for most of us, but for those living with mental health problems, voices may be the stuff of reality.

He believed he was part of the conspiracy, that someone was going to come and kill him. He believed there were cameras in the flat, and an alcoholic, just to cope. I’m sure they would have helped him and it definitely would have helped me as well.”

At the sixth attempt, Ricky committed suicide. He could no longer live with the constant mental pressure of his psychotic illness. He was 28 years old.

For Doreen, the loss was unbearable – and the after-shock has had a devastating long-term impact on her family. “It’s really hard to cope with it. Nearly broke my relationship up. When Ricky died, my eldest son would not speak to me, he blames me for the suicide. It goes on and on, it really affects the family.”

“My mum found it very hard to talk about my son and my sister wouldn’t talk to me at all about him. I virtually turned into a recluse and an alcoholic, just to cope. I couldn’t get him help because there was nowhere for me to take him – and I felt guilty about that.”

Lambeth and Southwark Mind is set to launch a dedicated psychosis service this year, providing expert support for people like Ricky.

Doreen hopes her son’s story will help others who find themselves in his position to seek help: “If Ricky’s story helps just one person to go for help then it will all be worth it.”

New psychosis therapy project

Hallucinations, illusions and imaginary voices may be the stuff of fantasy for most of us, but for those living with psychotic conditions these symptoms can become a part of everyday life.

In complex cases, standard treatments don’t always work and mental health services face a constant challenge to find the right form of therapy for each individual.

Lambeth and Southwark Mind is set to launch a pioneering new service this spring that will offer long-term treatment for Londoners in the grip of a mental health crisis.

The psychosis therapy project aims to promote and develop individualistic support for people with psychotic diagnoses.

It has already proved hugely successful in north London, where Islington Mind has been delivering a similar service for the last four years.

Dorotheé Bonnigal-Katz, an experienced psychoanalyst who runs her own practice in Leamington Spa, is leading the initiative.

“We work with people on the basis of their experience, not their symptoms or behaviour,” she says. “We focus on that you offer for people to be able to benefit.”

“Time-limited work can be helpful in some ways – but it’s just not enough. I really believe in the benefits of talking therapy for people with this profile. I think it will be highly beneficial in south London.”

Lambeth and Southwark Mind will be launching the free service as a pilot programme in partnership with the Mosaic Clubhouse in Brixton in March.

Dorotheé Bonnigal-Katz will present the charity’s annual lecture on psychosis therapy to mark the start of the project next month. The lecture takes place at 336 Brixton Road, London on Saturday February 25, starting at 2pm. Tickets are available online at http://bit.ly/2C96rZu.

The South London Press is giving away free tickets to the first 10 readers to contact reporter Jack Dixon on 07933 560078 or via email at this address: jack@londonweeklynews.co.uk. Maximum two tickets per person.
Happy 90th, ‘Mr Rudest’

SOHO legend Norman Balon, long celebrated as “London’s rudest landlord”, was for once lost for insults when his old regulars sprang a 90th birthday surprise at his return to the Coach and Horses in Greek Street.

Mr Balon, famed for his abuse to customers at the bar that he ran for 60 years before his retirement in 2006, thought he was just popping in for a pint at his old pub on Thursday – but he found the Coach packed with pals going back to the days when his regulars included the Private Eye team, artists Francis Bacon, Lucien Freud and Damien Hirst and actors John Hurt and Peter O’Toole.

Typically, at first he gave a grumpy response “Prove it!” to which Norman characteristically responded “F— off! They’re all bloody nuisance, every one of them.”

But when the penny dropped the notoriously grumpy Mr Balon thawed. “As soon as Norman realised the good, the bad and the ugly of Soho were there to pay their respects and celebrate with him, he was back in his stride as if he had never left,” said Mr Balon.

On this occasion Norman was very happy and this was evident in the smiles and laughter ringing around the pub.

There were a number of hilarious speeches relaying the times and memories of those who know Norman the best. Michael Magarrian, a long-time friend who first visited the pub in 1972 and now a criminal defence QC, delivered the first speech of memories of the pub and personal story of his friendship with Norman.

The highly amusing stories, lilted with profanity, included Michael’s observation that Norman was not the rudest landlord in London but indeed London’s rudest person, which received huge applause – but he finished with the words “What many don’t realise, Norman, is that you are of bigger stature and even bigger of heart”.

Struan Rogers, the actor and Norman’s great friend and chess partner, really summed the occasion up and left not a dry eye in the house when he said “These people would not have turned up here today if you were not held in such high regard. And on behalf of everyone here, thank you very, very, very much not for what you were but for what you are.”

Following the speeches, including from Mr Balon’s daughters Lisa and Natalie, the acclaimed cartoonist Michael Heath presented Mr Balon with the latest cartoon addition to the pub’s collection, Norman’s 90th birthday card. Michael proclaimed Norman to be his father figure and his very moving speech. Michael showed the love and respect between these two luminaries,” said Mr Choat.

The final presentation came from artist and writer Nick Wells, who gave Mr Balon a customised version of the Oscar; a Norman-styled toby jug with the inscription “Norman Balon for exceptional services to Soho”. By the end even Norman had a tear in his eye. But that did not put him off his traditional style,” said Mr Choat.

In his acceptance speech he said “I hated the customers, they were a bloody nuisance, every one of them.

“But I am very touched about all of this. This is a very great day in my life, as you can all realise, and I want to thank my children and my wife, my great friends here and Private Eye. It’s been a fantastic day, a complete surprise and don’t forget to pay your bill before you go.”

Mr Choat said: “For me as the current landlord, trying to fill a giant pair of shoes and feeling a little like David Moyes, the most moving moment was seeing the joy in Norman’s face.”

Why should I go to a public event about health and social care?

The NHS and your local council are holding a joint public event for residents of Kensington and Chelsea, and Queen’s Park and Paddington. Here’s why you should go…

HEALTH and social care in your local area is changing. NHS West London Clinical Commissioning Group and the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea are holding a joint event called Your Health, Your Care to tell you about plans to bring health and social care closer together – and give you the opportunity to ask questions about these plans.

The doors will open at 6pm for you to browse open stalls offering health and social care advice, and locally tailored information on how to choose the right NHS service for a particular need.

From 6.30pm, there will be a series of short talks from health and social care staff. These talks will be followed by a lively questions-and-answers session, where residents, patients and carers can ask questions in a public setting – and really listen to the answers.

Dr Fiona Butler, chairman of NHS West London Clinical Commissioning Group said: “We are really looking forward to Your Health, Your Care on January 31. It will be a great opportunity for us to hear from patients, carers and the public, and an opportunity for them to get some detail from us about how we will improve services in the CCG area.”

NHS West London Clinical Commissioning Group has already set out its priorities for joining up health and social care in the Sustainability and Transformation Plan, which was drawn up between eight clinical commissioning groups and a number of local councils. This shared North West London Sustainability and Transformation Plan has been submitted to NHS England for approval, and it has been published in its current form on the clinical commissioning group website.

The plan is a blueprint for essentially doing five things: driving an overall improvement to the health and wellbeing of our population; making sure everyone uses the right NHS service – sustainable, and smartly run; helping people over 65 stay fit and independent; tackling the roots of mental-health problems in our community by guaranteeing strong preventive care in the early stages of illness; and giving patients with long-term illnesses such as asthma or diabetes, and their carers, reliable health education from our clinical experts to help them live a successful, dynamic life. Attendees at the event will have the chance to ask questions about the reasons for these plans, how the pieces will work in practice, and what benefits can be expected as a result.

Cllr Mary Weale, the royal borough’s cabinet member for adult social care and public health, said: “This is a chance for users of these services to put questions to those who plan and deliver them.”
WILL the Queen’s Birthday Honours in June feature a gong for Richard Osman – for services to Her Majesty’s teatime TV entertainment? Odd as it may sound to some, Alexander Armstrong, Osman’s co-host of Pointless, the popular BBC One general-knowledge quiz show, has revealed that the Queen is a fan.

“A palace insider told us that she watches it,” Armstrong told Radio Times.

Although Her Majesty’s viewing habits are officially undeclared, many claims have been made over the years as to what she likes to goggle. At one point some years ago it was reported that she was a huge fan of Countdown.

“The Queen accidentally became a fan of the Channel 4 words and numbers game because it followed the afternoon racing slot. According to her biographer Brian Hoey, Her Majesty was not amused when the time of the programme was brought forward as it then clashed with her walk in the palace grounds with her corgis,” the Daily Express reported.

Mr Hoey, author of At Home With The Queen, has also been credited as the source for claims that Her Majesty was also a keen viewer of Downton Abbey. He revealed that came up in a conversation with a worker at Buckingham Palace.

He told The Daily Telegraph: “We were talking about Trooping the Colour and how the Queen always notices if anything is not quite right, such as one young officer she spotted wearing his medals in the wrong order not long ago.

“Apparently she is exactly the same when she is watching the television. She loves watching Downton Abbey and pointing out things they have got wrong, partly because she is familiar with Highclere Castle, where it is filmed.

“She used to stay there as a guest of the Carnarvon family.”

As further claims over the years have had it that Her Majesty also enjoys EastEnders, Coronation Street, Last Of The Summer Wine, New Tricks, Midsomer Murders, Doctor Who, Dad’s Army, The Last Detective, The Bill and, bizarrely, The X-Factor, it’s a wonder that she has any time to get any banqueting done. Her Majesty’s television viewing must have been especially busy of late as it has been also claimed that she is a fan of The Crown, Netflix’s magnificent 10-hour first series of its £100 million biographical drama of the Queen’s reign.

If such is the case, Her Majesty may be disappointed to learn that Claire Foy, the actress who last week won a Golden Globe award for her portrayal of the young Queen Elizabeth in the saga, is shortly to be leaving the drama.

Although Ms Foy has been signed to continue playing the Queen in the second series which starts filming soon, she will then be replaced by an older actress as The Crown rolls on to dramatise the 1965-1985 years at the palace.

“After two seasons, that’s it, I’m gone,” said 32-year-old Ms Foy.

Among those currently being tipped to take over the much-sought role are Emily Watson, 49, Rachel Weisz, 46, and Kate Beckinsale, 43.

The government’s surprise decision to back the campaign for greater understanding of mental illness is being seen as a triumph for the Kate Factor, series George.

It is believed that it was the high-profile campaigning by the young royals of Kensington Palace for an end to the stigmatisation of the mentally ill which influenced Prime Minister Theresa May to call for a revolution in mental health care. The success of the new “let’s be open about mental health” drive by the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Prince Harry is thought to have had a key effect on the new Downing Street policy.

The government wants to effect sweeping change in social care, quashing prejudices and ignorance as modern Britain is educated to the fact that there is no shame, no penalty, in becoming mentally ill.

Last week the Prime Minister made the fight for better understanding official, when she launched what aspires to be the biggest drive in British history to eradicate the stigma of mental illness, following the lead of the Kensington Three and this newspaper’s Change Is Possible campaign. The issue, said Mrs May, had for too long been dangerously disregarded.

Although charities including Mind, Mencap, Time To Change and Sane have for years campaigned for this better awareness, it is believed that it has been the passionate efforts of three royals that have caused the government to rethink the way society treats those who suffer any of the many illnesses of the head.

The high-profile and much-publicised work of the three young royals and their Heads Together campaign has helped drive the authorities to get a grip at last on a problem which has become a mental-health crisis.

Mrs May acknowledged the influence of the young royals when she announced her mental-health reforms last week.

In her speech to the Charity Commission she said: “For years the only people who have stood up for those with mental ill health have been civil society groups and charities.

“Now I want us to build upon your success and the fantastic work that many of you are doing today. Organisations such as Mind, who have led the way in helping those experiencing mental-health problems and the Heads Together campaign – and the fantastic leadership shown by their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Prince Harry – that aims to break the stigma surrounding mental-health problems.”

Now, as the latest endorsement of the work of the Kensington Three in their fight to improve attitudes to mental illness and government commitment to the cause, it is hoped that Mrs May could announce that the Treasury will take money raised for the royal mental-health cause at this year’s London Marathon.

Last year’s success of the Kensington Three, this year’s marathon will be staged to raise cash for the Heads Together campaign. As Mrs May has now set out her stall that no illness more debilitates the nation than mental illness, it is hoped that on the eve of the big run on April 23 she will announce further funding.

It is believed that Prime Minister Theresa May’s call for a revolution in mental health care was influenced by the campaigning of Kate and William, together with Prince Harry for the marathon’s cause in the form of grants, tax breaks or VAT relief.

The Prime Minister has been swayed to act on the mental-health crisis by the royals who splashed out their commitment in a joint statement last year.

They said: “Through our work with young people, emergency response, homeless charities and veterans, we have seen time and time again that unresolved mental-health problems lie at the heart of some of our greatest social challenges.

“Too often, people feel afraid to admit that they are struggling with their mental health. This fear of prejudice and judgement stops people from getting help and can destroy families and end lives. Heads Together wants to help people feel much more comfortable with their everyday mental wellbeing and have the practical tools to support their friends and family.

“The Heads Together campaign will build on the great work being done by our partner charities so that prejudice and fear no longer stand in the way of people getting the help they need.

“Being the 2017 Virgin Money London Marathon Charity of the Year is the perfect springboard for the Heads Together campaign. We cannot wait to see hundreds of runners hitting the streets of London in April to end the stigma and change the conversation on mental health once and for all.

“However, although the huge media coverage of so many running for our minds will very much help to put the issue on the public agenda, it may need more effort than that to effect the change in attitude which the Prime Minister spoke of last week when she said: “For too long mental illness has been something of a hidden injustice, shrouded in a completely unacceptable stigma and dangerously disregarded as a second-class issue to physical health. Left unaddressed, it destroys lives, it separates people from each other and deepens the divisions within our society.”

A key effort which is needed for the campaign to have the success it deserves is for every facility to be open and honest about any history of mental illness. As one in four have suffered or will suffer from a broken mind, that means that there are an awful lot of us in the closet and, as was the case with the “glad to be gay” campaign which marvellously changed outdated thinking in the 1970s, mental-health experts believe that a similar openness is required now.

“We will be interested to see whether William, Kate and Harry’s work lifts the incidences of mental ill health in the history of royalty in order to push home the point that it is an illness which affects all, and therefore help affects the stigma.

“As Dr Lucy Worsley, the royal and TV historian, noted some years back when she presented the BBC documentary Fit To Rule: “It is counter-intuitive to suggest it but royal health issues can actually strengthen the monarchy, not least by creating sympathy and affection for an afflicted individual.”

In the case of her programme, Dr Worsley was discussing the case of George III, long dismissed as the mad king who lost America.

She wrote: “In recent years, it has become fashionable among historians to put his ‘madness’ down to the physical, genetic blood disorder called porphyria. Its symptoms include aches and pains, as well as blue urine.

“The theory formed the basis of a long-running play by Alan Bennett, The Madness of George III, which was later adapted for film starring Nigel Hawthorne in the title role. However, a new research project based at St George’s, University of London, has concluded that George III did actually suffer from mental illness after all.

“Using the evidence of thousands of George III’s own handwritten letters, Dr Peter Garrad and Dr Vassiliki Rentoumni have been analysing his use of language. They have discovered that during his episodes of illness, his sentences were much longer than when he was well.

“A sentence containing 400 words and eight verbs was not unusual. George III, when ill, often repeated himself, and at the same time his vocabulary became much more complex, creative and colourful.

“These are features that can be seen today in the writing and speech of patients experiencing the manic phase of psychiatric illnesses such as bipolar disorder.

“Mania, or harmful euphoria, is at one end of a spectrum of mood disorders, with sadness, or depression, at the other. George being in a manic state would also match contemporary descriptions of his illness by witnesses. They spoke of his ‘prodigal loquacity’ and his habit of talking until the foam ran out of his mouth. Sometimes he suffered from convulsions, and his pages had to sit on him to keep him safe on the floor.

“Legislators have even thrown doubt on one of the key planks in the case for porphyria, the blue urine. George III’s medical records reveal that the king was given medicine based on gentian. This plant, with its deep blue flowers, is still used today as a mild tonic but may turn the urine blue.

“So maybe it wasn’t the king’s ‘madness’ that caused his most famous symptom. He could have simply been mad.”

In her Fit To Rule series, Dr Worsley examined our kings and queens as individual members of the human race, rather than just as impenetrable icons of splendour and power, and concluded: “They suffered many of exactly the same biological and psychological weaknesses as the rest of us.

“The explanations or diagnoses that we come up with for patients in the past reflect our own current attitudes to sickness and health. One of the reasons that the porphyria argument caught on is because it seemed to tone down the supposed mental-health issues from the Royal Family.”

Help correct the belief that a broken mind is more stigmatising or shameful than a broken leg, it is worth considering that George III was not the only royal to have suffered in the same way as many of us.

Prince John, the fifth son and youngest of the six children born to King George V and his wife Queen Mary, was discovered to have epilepsy and was also believed to have some form of intellectual disability and possibly autism. As his condition deteriorated, he was sent to live at Sandringham House and was kept away from the public eye. His illness was only disclosed to the public after his tragically early death, aged 13, in 1949 after a severe seizure.

More recently, a Channel 4 documentary of five years ago revealed the story of Nerissa and Katherine Bowes-Lyon, nieces of the late Queen Mother and cousins of the Queen, who were incarcerated for 40 years in the Royal Earlswood Asylum for Mental Defectives in Surrey and were placed for care there in 1943 as they were born at a time when children with learning difficulties were a family’s stigmatisation secret.

But as Prince William argued at a Heads Together event just before Christmas, thankfully such secrets have now to be left behind.

“The rapid increase in poor mental health is one of the biggest challenges we face as a society and it is a challenge Catherine, Harry and I feel duty bound to tackle.

“When we have mental health, just as we have physical health, and we will all experience pressures on our mental health at some point in our lives.

“But for too long, held back by stigma, shame and fear, people have found it difficult to open up about others about those times when their mental health needs support.

“When we talk and listen to family, to friends and colleagues, we share the load; we reduce the problem and we realise we are not alone and we break down the barriers that prevent us from getting the help we need.

“It is really that simple: a problem shared is a problem halved.”

And now, with the government promising to put mental health on the agenda for the first time, it is only possible but is going to come.
Troels is the man to help bring down cyber crooks

TROELS Oerting, former chief security officer for Barclays Bank, is the new man to head the crackdown on cyber criminals.

He has been appointed chairman of the Global Cyber Alliance (GCA), an international, non-profit organisation focused on addressing systemic cyber risks and attacks. Oerting (pictured right) has vast experience in cyber security. Before his transition to the private sector, he spent more than 35 years in law enforcement with a focus on information security.

He held various senior leadership positions with the Danish police, including Director of Danish NCIS, National Crime Squad, SOCA and Director of operations in the Danish Security Intelligence Service. He also spent a 11 years at Europol as acting head of their Counter Terrorism and Financial Intelligence Centre.

“Over the past year, since GCA’s inception in late 2015, tremendous strides have been made in development of projects that will have dramatic impact on the state of cyber security,” said Oerting.

“Systemic cyber risk is an issue that every organisation – large or small, public or private – needs to address for themselves, their customers and to improve the digital world we all live in.”

The Posh time bomb

By Peter Faulkner

LONDON residents, some living in the most prestigious postcodes in the capital, are sitting on a potential time bomb.

Figures compiled by the Gas Safe Register, reveal that despite continual warnings people are still not getting gas appliances serviced and maintained by registered fitters.

Regents Park, Kensal Green and Chalk Farm combined were the three most serious districts with 303 faulty appliances recorded and of these 182 were unsafe gas fires.

But they were closely shadowed by Shepherds Bush with 301 unsafe appliances including 154 gas boilers, Kensal Green was next in the list with 225 faulty appliances, 104 of them boilers, while Hammersmith also registered triple figures with 219 cases and 108 dodgy boilers.

In upper class Belgravia and Kensington there were a total of 179 dangerous appliances, 74 boilers in Kensington and 34 in Belgravia while equally posh Chelsea totalled 124 cases and 73 faulty boilers.

Earls Court, commonly known as bedsit city, had just 46 cases but more than half (27) were dangerous boilers.

The figures are disturbing because it highlights the ignorance of residents and because it only covers the homes that Gas Safe were able to survey, it means there are hundreds more potential homes in danger.

A spokesman for the Gas Safe Register said: “All gas appliances in your property need to be safety checked by a Gas Safe registered engineer annually and serviced according to manufacturer’s instructions.

“Any appliance left unchecked could leave residents at risk of carbon monoxide poisoning. It’s a good idea to have your gas pipework inspected at the same time as having a gas safety check, every year.

“People are putting their lives in danger as they are far too trusting of tradesmen, employing workmen based on their appearance and behaviours rather than qualifications and skills.

“The majority of people admitted the most common things they look for are politeness, good eye contact, confidence, good clothing and a nice smile.

“The figures are a concern to gas safety officials as we believe millions of people are letting unscrupulous tradesmen into their homes.”

“Depending on the type of work being carried out, they are putting theirs and their families’ lives at risk. In fact the research went on to reveal that one in five people – the equivalent of 14 million people – said they had been let down by a tradesman.”

Don’t be a victim of phone thieves

A MAJOR drive to crack down on mobile phone thefts and pick-pocketing in Westminster ends this month a part of the Metropolitan Police campaign Operation Blizzard.

Officers have been out in force during Christmas and New Year to try and save revellers the inconvenience of having their mobile phone stolen.

As many as 10,000 mobile phones are stolen every month, often by opportunistic thieves who will take any chance to steal a phone, which can be distressing, costly and a huge inconvenience.

The Met is urging the public to take a few simple steps to prevent crime:

■ Don’t leave your phone unattended on a table or in a bag.
■ On a night out, look out for each other’s phones.
■ If you need to use your phone, be aware of your surroundings. Try going hands free or stand away from the roadside close to a wall so no one can come up behind you.
■ Don’t text while you’re walking, your won’t notice potential thieves approaching.
■ Make sure security features like keypad locks and remote data wiping are all activated to stop thieves from accessing your phone and personal data.
■ Know how to identify your phone if it’s stolen
■ Find your IMEI number by dialling *#06# from your phone and keep a written note of it.
■ Register your phone on www.immobilise.com to help police return recovered stolen property and combat the sale of stolen goods.

Your number’s up

A CREDIT card with a constantly changing security code has been launched to try and combat fraud.

The three numbers on the back of the card will be replaced by a digital display randomly generating a new security code every hour.

The digital security company Oberthur Technologies is talking to UK banks about introducing the innovative card and was due to launch in France at the end of 2016.

The security code on the back of most credit and debit cards is required to make payments online.

Fraud in the UK involving cards, remote banking and cheques totalled £755m in 2015, with more than 20,000 victims.

The mini-screen on the new card is powered by a small battery designed to last three years.

Mayor calls on business support to write an industrial plan for capital

BY GEOFF BAKER
geoff@londonweeklynews.co.uk

SADIQ Khan has called on London business leaders to let him be in charge of writing the capital’s new industrial strategy.

The Mayor of London, whose previous business experience before entering politics was as a human rights lawyer and chairman of the National Council for Civil Liberties, has outlined his plans for a strategy with the aim of maximising growth and protecting the capital’s economy post-Brexit.

Speaking at the London Government Dinner at Mansion House, Sadiq Khan asked the capital’s political and business leaders to work with him to develop the new industrial plan which will be designed to improve the city’s competitiveness.

He also called on the Government to give London more control over the economic levers required to secure future growth and warned that the Government was increasingly heading for a “muddled Brexit”, saying “the only thing that would be as damaging as a hard Brexit is a muddled Brexit”.

The Mayor urged business leaders to continue campaigning to put access to the single market and access to skilled workers at the heart of the Government’s EU negotiating position and he announced that London will write its own industrial strategy, to feed into the Government’s UK-wide industrial strategy white paper, which is expected to be published later this year.

He warned, “any industrial strategy that doesn’t work for London will be defined not work for Britain.”

On a new industrial strategy for London, Sadiq Khan said: “We can’t just stand idly by when there are things that we can do right now to reassure investors and help to stimulate economic growth.”

“A key part of making London more competitive will be ensuring our city has the power and levers it needs to stimulate our economy. More control for London was important before the referendum, but in the light of Brexit and the economic uncertainty we now face – it’s become absolutely crucial.

“So I want to work with every London council and business to ensure we have the tools we need to implement a new industrial strategy for the capital. Because we need more control of the right levers to improve competitiveness, stimulate growth and invest in our long-term future.

“And the bottom line is this – if we want an industrial strategy that works for London and therefore for Britain – we must have more control.”

On Brexit, Sadiq Khan said: “It’s deeply concerning that we still appear to have muddled thinking at the heart of government so soon before the negotiations are set to start.

“For months now, I’ve been arguing against a hard Brexit. But the only thing that would be as damaging as a hard Brexit is a muddled Brexit.

“And, unfortunately, it looks like is where we are heading without urgent action.

“So I urge you to join me in continuing to put pressure on ministers to fight for the right deal for London – and therefore the right deal for the whole country. This means fighting to retain privileged access to the single market - the foundation of Britain’s jobs, wealth and prosperity - and fighting to retain our ability to employ the best and the brightest talent from Europe and around the world.

“And it means fighting to avoid a reckless hard-headed, hard Brexit approach without any transitional plans in place. It’s not too late for the Government to take note and set a new tone.”

John Dickie, Director of Strategy and Policy at business group London First, welcomed the Mayor’s lead on a new business plan.

“If we make the right decisions now, staying open to skilled and talented people and investing in the homes, transport and digital infrastructure we need, London will continue to grow,” he said.

“With the government, the Mayor and business working together, we can create a more productive London - increasing growth by just one per cent generates an extra £150 billion by 2030 - meaning more jobs, greater prosperity and stronger public services for the UK as a whole.”

The City of London Corporation’s Policy Chair- man Mark Boleat added: “With the Brexit negotiations approaching, the world’s attention is focussing on London. For the 450,000 employees and nearly 10,000 firms based in the City alone, as well as the 750,000 financial and professional service employees in London, there’s a lot at stake.

“Other major European cities are vying to lure businesses and talent away from our city, and are doing so with a well-structured approach. What we must realise is that the UK’s financial services sector is deeply entrenched within Europe. London is a financial centre for the whole of Europe and institutions based in the City are entrenched links with corporates in the EU27.

“In order to leave the European Union with the least amount of disruption to financial services businesses and more importantly their customers, it is vital that there should be a transition period.

“Devolution will also play an important role in supporting the wider economy as Britain faces its most significant challenge in recent years and so we support the London Mayor’s strategy for power to be devolved from central Government to London.”

It’s enough to make any Scotsman turn to drink – London’s boozier experts are predicting a new trend in the capital’s bars and pubs this year will be demand for French whiskey.

And to further send Highlanders to reach for the bottle, the alcohol authorities say trendy drinkers will also be ordering whiskies made by the Swiss, previously famed for their chocolate and clocks.

In its assessment of fashionable tipples for 2017, DrinkUp London, the body which monitors the city’s drinking habits, says hipsters will be ordering whiskies distilled in Brittany, the Champagne region and Lorraine.

Although it may be news to hardened Scotch drinkers, the French have been making whiskey since 1697 and there are now more than 60 distilleries in France.

According to a study last year, the French are the largest consumers of Scotch. And now they are set to follow the Japanese and send their own labels to London – along with the Aussies.

“Away from Japanese whisky, 2017 will bring an increased awareness of malts from Tasmania, Australia’s southern-most state, France, Wales, New Zealand, Taiwan, Switzerland, even India,” reports DrinkUp London in its forecast.

“With such a range of climates attempting to mimic the great whiskies of America and Scotland we can look forward to some intriguing world whiskies.”

But all is not doomed for a dran of the hard stuff as the experts say the imports are unlikely to challenge the great malts of Scotland in sales.

“Scotch and bourbon are hardly going to be knocked off their perch as the two biggest whisky categories in the world. But for a start they’re simply too tasty, with an endless array of styles and flavours, to bow down to new world spirits,” says the boozey body.

“Across the world, however, smaller markets are fast proving themselves worthy of a spot on the shelf bar.”

DrinkUp London is also predicting a boom in Londoners drinking French regional liqueurs, vermouths and aperitifs like the recently-launched 30&40, an aperitif from Normandy that mixes calvados, apple juice and rum.

French is the new Scotch!
Take That star’s ‘incredible’ journey with new musical

Nicky Sweetland of LWN meets Gary Barlow and Tim Firth to talk about their show The Girls

WITH an abundance of exciting new shows set to hit the West End over the next few months, there’s one in particular which has got the critics wowing with anticipation. And after watching a rehearsal, I can say that Gary Barlow and Tim Firth’s The Girls promises to be a musical not to be missed.

Based on the beloved real-life story of the Calendar Girls, which saw a group of Yorkshire women hit the headlines when they posed for a Women’s Institute nude charity calendar, the new musical will open in the West End next month and feature songs by Take That star Gary, who spoke with fervor about the task of setting the tale to music.

Gary said: “This is an unbelievable story and the best thing of all is that it’s a true story. The real people are here to tell the story. The Calendar Girls are with us every step of the way with this musical – so as a writer, to have that put in front of you and to see the opportunity for music has been incredible.”

The real-life story has become something of British legend and was made into a blockbuster movie in 2003 starring Helen Mirren and Julie Walters. It was later adapted as a stage play, which was performed both in the West End and by amateur organisations across the country.

Writer Tim had always intended to turn the story into a musical. And after taking his childhood friend Gary to see a production of The Calendar Girls, the pair embarked on the project.

Tim said: “The truth is that lots of people thought when I first wrote it as a play and a film that it was a musical. I used to see it printed in the paper as the new musical Calendar Girls and after a while I started to think ‘Well, maybe there is a musical here’.”

As the writing process progressed, the duo decided to give more focus to the families and community involved in the tale.

Tim said: “The idea grew of creating a village-green musical for the world, a musical that radiates out from this village green and that tells the story of this extraordinary feat but also of the husbands and the kids. It allows you to spend more time with the village and enjoy that comedy – and that’s when we set sail.”

Gary said: “I had to feel like I could bring something to it and immediately, while we were watching the play, I could hear the music. I could hear what it could sound like and I could hear how it could help the story and what it could bring to the whole process, so for me it was incredibly exciting. It’s been a bit of a journey.”

The Girls has already wowed audiences with performances in both Leeds and Manchester and will open at the Phoenix Theatre on Charing Cross Road on February 21. As well as boasting music by British favourite Gary, the production features choreography by Lizzi Gee and has an all-star cast, including Michele Dotrice, Claire Moore and Joanna Riding, to play the unadorned Yorkshire lovelies.

To date, The Calendar Girls have raised almost £5 million for the Bloodwise charity, with much of the money going to research cures and treatments. Since the Calendar Girls began their fundraising, the number of children who now survive following a diagnosis with leukemia has increased by 80 percent.

The musical will continue to raise money for the cause, with a percentage of the profits going straight to the charity. As a show of goodwill to West End audiences, Gary and Tim have also decided to offer tickets with no booking fees or premium rates.

Tim said: “Doing a musical and seeing an audience react to it the way they did in Leeds and Manchester is just thrilling anyway – but it’s also incredible to know that from every performance, we are contributing to this research. The truth is that it’s an honest musical, it’s an English musical and I hope that it’s a musical that will make you laugh so much that you’ll forget that you’ve cried.”

Gary is very much the man of the moment as far as musical theatre is concerned, with another show set to hit the stage later this year, a production which will feature the music of Take That and be performed by a brand new boyband cast from his BBC One Saturday-night television talent show Let It Shine.

Despite some fairly harsh criticism about the cheesy format, the television series – which boasts an enviable group of presenters and judges including Graham Norton, Mel Giedroyc and Gary’s band-mates Howard Donald and Mark Owen – Let It Shine is so far narrowly winning the ratings war over ITV’s The Voice UK.

Gary is delighted with the results and said: “I’m very pleased. Obviously the shows that you’re watching at the moment... we shot most of them in September last year so I’ve seen them all and I’m very, very happy. For me the most important thing of all is this amazing talent, which I know we have. You’re yet to see a lot of it but it’s going to be very exciting.”

The Girls will begin previews from January 28 at the Phoenix Theatre, with a glamorous opening night on February 21.

Amazing lunchtime experience at American-style hidden gem

Right in the heart of the city I stumbled across a real hidden gem. The American-style Jackson and Rye restaurant opened a new foodie haven on Old Jewry in Bank just before Christmas – and I can safely say that when I visited on a cold December afternoon, it proved one of the best lunchtime experiences I’ve ever had, writes Nicky Sweetland.

The opulent Art Deco interior coupled with some subtle lighting helps to create a luxurious ambiance. But somehow an affordable and relaxed air is also maintained, which results in the perfect atmosphere for anyone who fancies a break from the hustle and bustle of the world outside.

I consulted the waiting staff to get their opinions before I ordered and I started with a beetroot and curd salad (goat cheese, balsamic vinegar, walnuts, £5.50), which was a fabulously tangy mix of flavours, while fresh and light, so also perfect as a light bite.

I then feasted on beef short rib, prepared in the smoker on site and served with fresh coleslaw, gherkins and a tankard filled with thick cut chips (£18.50). The tender flesh fell off the bone and the wondrous smoky aftertaste lingered long after my final mouthful.

The rich and succulent main meal was helped along with a glass of Cabernet Sauvignon before I ventured on to dessert.

Again on the advice of my waiter, I sampled an exquisite melting chocolate sundae (£6.95). Hot butterscotch sauce is used to melt the chocolate baulbe before your eyes, leaving a rich brownie topped with sumptuous vanilla ice cream; a warming and truly delectable sweet treat.

The buoyant bistro is also busy at breakfast time and is a great place to go for an after-work dinner.

With its location in the middle of the business quarter and the abundance of dishes to choose from, for all sizes of appetite, you really can’t go wrong at Jackson and Rye.

The company also has restaurants in Soho, Chiswick, Richmond and Kingston. You can get more details by visiting website jacksonrye.com.

Red hot chilli peppers can help you live longer, claims new research from USA

Curry and other spicy food containing red hot chilli peppers help people to live longer, according to new research.

Spicy dishes could become part of future healthy eating advice after the study revealed those who eat chilli peppers have a death rate 13 per cent lower than those who do not.

Health benefits could be down to the chilli pepper’s principal component, capsaicin, which is believed to help prevent obesity and modulate coronary blood flow, the study says.

Peppers and spices have been thought to help treat diseases for centuries – but this is only the second study to examine the association between chilli pepper consumption and mortality.

Medical student Mustafa Chopan and Professor of Medicine Benjamin Littenberg used data collected from over 16,000 Americans who were followed for up to 23 years.

The University of Vermont duo examined the baseline characteristics of participants according to red chilli pepper consumption.

They found that consumers of red hot chilli peppers tended to be younger, male, white, Mexican-American, married, smokers, alcohol drinkers, with a lower income and less education than participants who did not consume red chilli peppers.

They examined data from a median follow-up of 18.9 years and observed the number of deaths before analysing specific causes of death.

Chopan and Littenberg say: “Although the mechanism by which peppers could delay mortality is far from certain, transient receptor potential channels, which are primary receptors for pungent agents such as capsaicin (the principal component in chilli peppers), may in part be responsible for the observed relationship.”

Possible explanations the authors give for red chilli peppers’ health benefits include that capsaicin is believed to aid cellular and molecular mechanisms that prevent obesity and modulate coronary blood flow – and has antimicrobial properties that “may indirectly affect the host by altering the gut microbiota”.

Mark Hix MBE’s Recipe of the Week

CRAB and corn fritters with spiced crab mayonnaise

Serves 8-10 as snacks

For the fritters

- 60–70g brown crab meat
- 3tbsp good quality mayonnaise
- 1 red chilli, finely chopped

For the mayonnaise

- 150g cooked sweetcorn kernels, chopped
- 3tbsp chopped chives
- 120g Doves Farm gluten-free self-raising flour, or equivalent
- About 120–150ml chilled sparkling water
- Salt and freshly ground black pepper
- 100–120g fresh white crab meat
- Vegetable or corn oil for deep frying

First make the mayonnaise. As it’s such a small quantity, a good liquidiser should do the trick.

Blend the brown crab, mayonnaise and chilli until smooth, then transfer to a small dish.

Mix the sweetcorn, chives and flour together, then add enough sparkling water to make a thick batter.

Season, fold in the white crab meat, and leave to rest for 10–15 minutes.

Heat about 8cm of oil to 160–180C in a large thick-bottomed saucepan or electric deep-fat fryer.

Drop a teaspoon of the mixture into the hot fat and cook for a minute or so until golden, turning with a slotted spoon as it’s cooking, and drain on some kitchen paper. Repeat with the rest of the batter, checking the seasoning and texture as you go; if the mixture seems a little stodgy then you can just dilute with some more sparkling water.

If you want to make them in advance, cook the fritters in a few batches without colouring them completely; then just return them to the hot fat when required. Serve with the crab mayonnaise.

- About 120–150ml chilled sparkling water
- Salt and freshly ground black pepper

First make the mayonnaise. As it’s such a small quantity, a good liquidiser should do the trick.

Blend the brown crab, mayonnaise and chilli until smooth, then transfer to a small dish.

Mix the sweetcorn, chives and flour together, then add enough sparkling water to make a thick batter.

Season, fold in the white crab meat, and leave to rest for 10–15 minutes.

Heat about 8cm of oil to 160–180C in a large thick-bottomed saucepan or electric deep-fat fryer.

Drop a teaspoon of the mixture into the hot fat and cook for a minute or so until golden, turning with a slotted spoon as it’s cooking, and drain on some kitchen paper. Repeat with the rest of the batter, checking the seasoning and texture as you go; if the mixture seems a little stodgy then you can just dilute with some more sparkling water.

If you want to make them in advance, cook the fritters in a few batches without colouring them completely; then just return them to the hot fat when required. Serve with the crab mayonnaise.

These make great little snacks to serve with drinks or as a starter. You could get away with buying dressed crab for this, so you have both brown and white meat.
It is one of music history’s most famous and influential albums, selling more than 25 million copies and inspiring generations of artists. But now The Joshua Tree – U2’s seminal 1987 record – will receive top billing as the band embark on a unique world tour performing the album from start to finish, in its entirety, for the first time.

March will mark 30 years since the iconic record’s release, spearheading the Irish group’s unparalleled rise to superstardom.

Remarked upon by critics for its heavy political themes, the album featured many of the band’s classic songs – from the heartbreakingly poignant “With Or Without You” to the soul-searching “I Still Haven’t Found What I’m Looking For” and the epic “Where The Streets Have No Name.”

London’s Twickenham Stadium will host the only British date on the tour, which also tracks the band around North America and many of Europe’s major cities.

The anniversary shows, which sparked a frenzy of excitement among fans around the world when they were announced last week, were inspired by the climatic political year that was 2016.

According to U2’s iconic lead guitarist The Edge, it was the perfect time to look back on an album that examined the changing face of America in the mid-1980s.

“It seems like we have come full circle from when The Joshua Tree songs were originally written, with global upheaval, extreme right-wing politics and some fundamental human rights at risk,” he said. “To celebrate the album – as these songs seem so relevant and prescient of these times too – we decided to do these shows. It feels right for now. We’re looking forward to it.”

The Joshua Tree went to number one in Ireland and around the world, selling in excess of 25 million copies and catapulting Bono, The Edge, Adam Clayton and Larry Mullen Jr from music heroes to international superstars.

Time magazine put U2 on its cover in April 1987, proclaiming them “rock’s hottest ticket” in a defining year for the band that saw their arena dates roll into stadium shows to accommodate escalating demand.

The 12 months that followed saw them create now-iconic moments – the traffic-stopping, Grammy Award-winning music video on the roof of a Los Angeles liquor store, as well as a triumphant return home with the original Joshua Tree Tour for four unforgettable shows in Belfast, Dublin and Cork in the summer of 1987.

“Twickenham will be the first European stop on the tour, which also includes the band’s first US festival headline appearance, at Bonnaroo Music & Arts Festival.”

The show in July, with support from former Oasis architect Noel Gallagher and his band the High Flying Birds, was poised to spark a deluge of booking requests as tickets went on sale yesterday.

It is likely to be the single biggest music event to take place in London this year, with hundreds of thousands of UK fans expected to jam the phones and lock down websites in the hunt for a ticket.

And if the comments of U2 frontman Bono are anything to go by, it promises to be a truly memorable occasion.

Recalling the making of the album, the singer described the record’s 11 tracks as “an opera”.

“Recently I listened back to The Joshua Tree for the first time in nearly 30 years,” he said. “(There was) a lot of emotions which feel strangely current – love, loss, broken promises to be a truly memorable occasion.

“Recently I listened back to The Joshua Tree for the first time in nearly 30 years,” he said. “(There was) a lot of emotions which feel strangely current – love, loss, broken dreams, seeking oblivion, polarisation, all the greats. I’ve sung some of these songs a lot but never all of them.

“I’m up for it. If our audience is as excited as we are it’s gonna be a great night – especially when we play at home at Croke Park (Dublin), it’s where the album was born 30 years ago.”

U2 will perform The Joshua Tree in full at London’s Twickenham Stadium on July 8. Tickets are now available from exclusive content from backstage, tracking down the stars and sharing all the behind-the-scenes buzz with viewers at home and in the arena.”

HE guy on before me was an “alternative” ventriloquist who drank beer while working the puppet’s mouth – he got boozed everywhere. So says comedian Omid Djallili, recalling his disastrous first foray into stand-up 20 years ago. “The compere said ‘Please will you welcome Omar Darjeeling’, I panicked on and slipped in all the spillage.”

As debut shows go, the Iranian comic’s bow was up there with the biggest flops of all.

After struggling with the microphone and slicing open his face, he fell head-first off the front of the stage before ripping a huge hole in his trousers as he clambered, walrus-like, back up. It was not quite the classy introduction he perhaps envisaged – yet, you would imagine, a pretty hilarious routine nonetheless. Funnily enough, it’s exactly this kind of high-energy buffoonery that Djallili continues to profit from today.

He still plays the ‘cheeky chap’ role – more than 20 years later – and delights in larks of a childlike nature, probing at touchy topics like a naughtily schoolboy. Despite the occasional flirtation with more controversial subject matter and the ‘big issues’, Djallili is, by his own admission, simply “too nice” for spiteful comedy.

Instead, the bits in his latest show – Schmuck For A Night, which comes to the Shepherd’s Bush Empire next week – are infused with a boyish charm and mischievous innocence. “As comedians we use humour as a kind of defence mechanism and I’m just trying to make sense of all the things going on around us,” he said in an ITV interview ahead of the tour, which is named after a line in the Martin Scorsese film King Of Comedy. Chelseaborn Djallili made his breakthrough in the early 2000s after catching the eye with subject matter inspired by the duality of his part-Iranian/part-West London elite cultural background.

His memorable early shows began with a tirade of material delivered in an aggressive Middle Eastern accent – only for Djallili to abandon the pretense 10 minutes in, scratch his head in resignation and mutter in eloquent middle-English: “Oh I’m sorry, I just can’t keep this up any more.”

The 51-year-old has made much of his Iranian roots during his career, starring in the 2010 film The Infidel, written by David Baddiel, as Iax Muslim father Mahmod Nasir who struggles to come to terms with the surprise discovery of his own Jewish heritage.

Proving himself an equally adept comedy actor, Djallili now possesses a packed CV brimming with namechecks and gold-star references.

His movie credits include bit parts in The Mummy, Notting Hill and The World Is Not Enough, as well as Sex and the City and an award-winning turn in Casanova plus a run as Pagin in the West End production of Oliver!

On television, he worked with the likes of Lenny Henry, Rob Brydon and Whoopi Goldberg before landing his own BBC sketch series – The Omid Djallili Show – in 2007.

A chat show couch-grazer ever since, Djallili has fostered his happy-go-lucky persona with appearances on reality shows Splash! and The Great Sport Relief Bake Off. But he returned last year with one of his most thoughtful performances to date – as Jo Brand’s bungling husband Dave in the under-the-radar BBC sitcom Going Forward.

Returning home to West London next week in the middle of a 100-plus-date UK tour with Schmuck For A Night, Djallili is sure to offer up a laugh-a-minute routine for comedy fans both old and new.

Omid Djallili performs Schmuck For A Night at the O2 Shepherd’s Bush Empire on Saturday January 21.

Love her or loathe her, Mrs Brown’s all set to fill Parky’s shoes

WHAT could possibly go wrong – apart from half of the nation switching off?

The Marmite of British comedy, the much-loved and equally much-detested Agnes Brown, is to step into the shoes of the mighty Michael Parkinson once filled with a new Saturday-night BBC show in which she chats to celebrities.

In a move that is expected to spectacularly infuriate its many critics – one of whom dubbed Mrs Brown’s Boys “lazy, end-of-pier trash rooted in the 1970s” – the BBC is fizzing with self-congratulation at having thought up the ratings-boosting wheeze All Round To Mrs Brown’s.

“Now BBC Entertainment and BBC One have commissioned a new Saturday-night series with Agnes Brown and all the Mrs Brown’s Boys favourites,” frothed a BBC spokesman. “Agnes is about to open the door of her very familiar family home, as mummy makes mischief with celebrity guests, surprise audience shenanigans and outrageous stunts, all in front of a live studio audience.”

“Whatever could possibly go wrong?”

Mrs Brown’s Boys creator, writer and star Brendan O’Carroll says: “The entire cast is excited by this.”

“I think Agnes may be worried that she’ll need a bigger kettle to make tea for everyone that’s coming round.”

Charlotte Moore, director of BBC content, sounds delighted at plans for the offshoot of the show once dubbed the worst comedy ever made and which will doubtless bring accusations that the corporation is now dumbing down to the Earth’s core.

She said: “Bringing one of our biggest comedy stars Mrs Brown to Saturday nights with a new entertainment show is going to be full of fun and mischief and totally unpredictable. I can’t wait.”

Her colleague Kate Phillips, controller entertainment commissioning, said: “We all agree it’s high time some of our bravest celebrities experienced a slice of the world according to Agnes and I can’t think of a finer or funnier format to do this in."

Well, perhaps not “all” agree. It is possibly doubtful that television critics like Grace Dent of The Independent will be cock-a-hoop.

She once memorably reviewed the show with the words: “Once seen, it is rarely forgotten. To love Mrs Brown, one must be thrilled by a man in a hairnet and dinner-lady tabard saying the F-word roughly once every 10 minutes, egged on by a loyal studio audience so whipped to hysteria by him that one can hear pants being soiled and spleens exploding with mirth.”

But Alan Tyler, the BBC commission editor for “entertainment”, is anticipating popping his spleen with hilarity.

He said: “Brendan is a truly special talent and in Mrs Brown he has created someone who is loved by our audience.”

“We are thrilled that Agnes is throwing her doors open and cannot wait to see what Brendan, Jenny (Jennifer Gibney) and the brilliant cast have in store for those who step inside.”

The series will transmit later this year; BBC licence fees are not refundable.

Mixed performances in a fabulous venue

Ginglik Laugh
Comedy Club
The Roof Gardens

GINGLIK Laugh Comedy Club ran within a converted public toilet in Shepherd’s Bush for more than 10 years but has now found a new home at Sir Richard Branson’s prestigious venue The Roof Gardens in Kensington, arrtis Nicky Sweetland.

For their inaugural evening of mirth they invited audiences to chortle along to some rising stars of the stand-up comedy circuit within the opulent and luxuriously leafy surroundings. Some 100ft above Kensington High Street and within The Tudor Marquee, the gathered throng were treated to a range of stand-up styles, with proceedings conducted by MC James Gill.

Humour is an interesting commodity – and although I could understand what Gill was attempting to do, warming up the obviously stiff and af-crue audience on a cold January evening was no easy task. Some of his interactions are just a bit too patronising with the continuous slow clapping required from all in attendance quickly losing its appeal.

The pace lifted when Rhys James took to the stage. The young comic, who has recently broken into the TV circuit with appear-ces on panel shows including Mock The Week and Virtually Famous, regaled with some hilarious confessions about his pranking as well as general observations on the life of a struggling comedian in his mid-20s.

After a short break, during which guests were invited to dine on an exorotantly priced gourmet buffet barbecue, and another round of slow clapping initiated by Gill, we were given a lesson in nerd by Chris Stokes.

Stokes’ style relies on long, cleverly angled anecdotes. But with an audience who were struggling to keep warm and who were chowing down on some overpriced burgers, he didn’t quite get the pitch right and lost the room by the end of his set.

The club has a strict curfew of 10pm – so when the headline act eventually made it to the stage, they had little more than 20 minutes in which to impress. Impress they did, however, as the pair who call themselves Abandaman expertly worked the room and became thoroughly engaged with their improvised hip-hop, lifting the mood and creating a frenzied excitement when asking for suggestions and volunteers.

Their clever lyrics, solid beats and rousing riffs had many laughing loudly, although the sound was a real issue – microphone too loud and music too quiet – and the set felt very rushed.

The venue is remarkable but if you are going before the spring, you will need to wrap up because despite the beating the marquee remains cold. I also suggest you eat before you go because with a burger and chips costing £15, only the wealthy are able to feast on the freshly prepared barbecue without worrying about their bank balance. You get a free cocktail if you are one of the first 50 guests and free entry to the glorious private members’ club until 2am.

Reviewing AUDRA MCDONALD at Leicester Square Theatre

ECORD-BREAKING, six-time Tony Award winner Audra McDonald is to return to London’s West End in April for four concerts at Leicester Square Theatre. The Broadway legend will be joined on stage this time by host and pianist Seth Rudetsky, who last month starred in the five-star London premier of his Broadway musical Disaster!

The performances will also include a special guest appearance by McDonald’s husband Will Swenson – the Tony-nominated star of Hair and Priscilla, Queen Of The Desert – and are produced by Mark Cortale.

The format of the evening will be a seamless mix of intimate behind-the-scenes stories from one of Broadway’s biggest stars – promp ted by Rudetsky’s probing, funny, revealing questions – and McDonald singing some of the biggest hits from her musical theatre repertoire.

This is a spontaneous evening of hilarity and show-stopping songs not to be missed. McDonald’s last series of Leicester Square Theatre concerts were recently named one of 2016’s best gigs of the year by reviewer Clive Davis of The Times.

And they were among LiveTheatreUK’s top 10 West End musicals of the year.

“Audra McDonald’s Leicester Square Theatre concert was not really a musical but it certainly counted as one of the greatest nights of musical theatre in the year.

“McDonald was a complete superstar, effortlessly telling deep affecting stories through song, connecting intuitively with her audience and singing with a ferocity, a gentle touch, a supremely confident and peerlessly matched tone that would take one’s breath away. Time after time.”

McDonald holds the record for more Tony best-performance wins than any other actor in history, and is the only person to win all four acting categories.

She married Swenson in 2012 and the couple became parents last year. Audra McDonald In Concert will run at Leicester Square Theatre on April 12, 13, 14 and 15. For more details, you can visit the website leicestersquaretheatre.com.

CHARING Cross Theatre has announced it will stage the world premiere of a brand new musical called The Braille Legacy. Inspired by the story of Louis Braille, a man who revolutionised the art of communication for the visually impaired, the show will star Olivier Award-nominated Jerome Pradon, pictured.

The word Braille is famous around the world and is the same in all languages. The Braille Legacy is supported by the Royal National Institute of Blind People and is the story of a revolution, with a heroic fight for independence, themes of difference, freedom, hope, love and the triumph of human values over adversity.

In Paris in the 19th century, blind people were victims of profound discrimination. Louis Braille, a bright young mind with a mad dream, arrives at the Royal Institute of Blind Youth, searching for the same chance as everyone else – to be free and independent. But he soon discovers that people and things aren’t always what they first seem.

By sheer determination and courage he stumbles upon something revolutionary: a simple idea, a genius invention, a legacy. Two hundred years ago, Louis Braille changed the world by inventing the tactile system of communication, the Braille alphabet, liberating the “People of the Night” and introducing literacy, knowledge and culture to a people who were otherwise trapped. It was their journey into the light.

Pradon’s West End credits include the UK pre-

The Braille Legacy has an original French book and lyrics by Sebastien Lanceron, music by Jean-Baptiste Sadaury, and an English translation by Ranjit Bolt. Music supervision and orchestra-tions are by Simon Lee.

The Braille Legacy will run at Charing Cross Theatre from April 16 to June 24. For more details, see charingcrosstheatre.co.uk.

AFTER a miserable start to Ian Holloway’s Queens Park Rangers homecoming spoiled by six consecutive defeats, the tide has turned with three straight Championship victories.

“I’m bursting with pride,” enthused Holloway last Thursday’s impressive and thoroughly deserved 1-0 win at promotion-chasing Reading, where Jamie Mackie hadn’t failed to sweep home the decisive 28th-minute goal from close-range.

“That’s a really good team we’ve played tonight and we’ve played so well - I couldn’t be more proud.

“We’ve freshened things up over the last few weeks and we got our reward again tonight.

“That’s three in a row now and hopefully it’s onwards and upwards because these boys deserve it.”

With striker Sebastien Haller sold to Genoa for a reported £26m last week for a stadium record signing, that’s four youngsters. Darnell Furlong, and Dele-Bashiru all got their first taste of senior action.

“Jamie Mackie epitomises QPR and what a lovely goal it was too,” said Holloway.

“I am happy with my team and they are able to control the game – they were better than us. But we know we have been doing well, we have been training well.

“But we need to react in the right way at Leicester and we did.”

Can Chelsea go on another amazing run of winning games and do the same in the FA Cup?

“I don’t think the (Diego) situation is something that will affect us. We did well again with the guys up front. That’s good for us.”

Against Leicester, Chelsea flourished with a reshaped attacking front three of Eden Hazard flanked by Willian and Pedro.

“We have the quality to replace Diego,” said Courtois. “He is important for us but if he is not there for one game, we can call on another one. There is obviously a different way of playing, because against Robert Huth and Wes Morgan there is no point in giving long balls to Eden Hazard, Willian and Pedro. But we did well and were able to control the game and early moments.

Courtois confirms that there appears to be a possibility about the set-up at the moment, irrespective of what’s going on off the pitch.

“We are very happy, everyone is happy at Chelsea at the moment,” he said. “If you are in first place with a seven-point lead, it helps. It helps that you are winning, it helps in the dressing room, in the playing and helps everybody accept the way of working.”

“The mood is very good, everyone trains very hard during the week. When we win like we did on Saturday, we get a free day on the Sunday and it’s obviously a nice feeling.

“We won in the right way, with good football. We are a group of players who are able to control the game and they were too many occasions where they looked like scoring.”

Flanagan describes the game as “a hard to get to the goal-scoring sensation” – a first-half brace and even a sweet left-footed finish.

“Courtois was impressed.

“He has a good quality shot. It is good that they feel we want to go and score goals. It is very good for us.

“We had an amazing run of winning 13 straight. I don’t think we played a bad game at Tottenham – they scored in two key moments. If we’d scored the equaliser just after half-time, I think we would have gone on to win like we did against Leicester City. But they scored to make it 2-0 and it was difficult.

“Tottenham are a good team and they were able to control the game – they were better than us. But we know we have been doing well, we have been training well.

“But we need to react in the right way at Leicester and we did.”

Of course, Chelsea face QPR next weekend, when we have a chance to get another three points.

China lure is poser for Costa
But Blues win in style at Leicester City without Diego

By Paul Lagan

DIEGO COSTA's future is in doubt amid the lure of Chinese riches. But Chelsea are very keen to play down the schism that ruptured the Cobham training ground last week, when Costa allegedly claimed he was injured and had a row with a member of the medical staff. Head coach Antonio Conte supported his staff – and Costa was sent to train alone for the rest of the week, having injured himself. Simple.

So with Costa unable to explain the situation, Conte put his reputation for honesty on the line when he said: "If you want to know the truth, I'm ready to tell the truth. On Tuesday during the training session Diego stopped because he felt a pain in his back. From that moment he didn't train during the week. For this reason he wasn't available for the starting 11 or the bench (against Chesterfield). This is the reason, the truth." OK, but when asked if he'd had a row with Costa, Conte said: "I have read a lot of speculation about this topic. I can tell if there are problems – and I repeat, if – with players, I am used to solving them in the changing rooms, not outside, not in Press conferences." So there you have it. The world's sports media reported a row and the club said that even if there was one, they would not reveal it. It now remains for any club that wants Costa to table a bid and see if it's accepted or not.

Meanwhile, Conte is still keen to land Swansea City's Spanish striker Fernando Llorente. While the coach still does not trust £22 million striker Michy Batshuayi to lead the line in Costa's absence, ex-Juventus striker Llorente is seen as the experienced replacement who would hit the ground running at Stamford Bridge. The trouble is the board are keen for Conte to utilise the existing squad rather than buy in. To that end, Patrick Bamford has been recalled from a loan spell sitting on the sidelines at Burnley to bolster Chelsea's options. But if the board seriously believe that Bamford is the solution, then they haven't fully grasped the problem.

With Oscar having left to take up the ultra-lucrative offer from China, and with a host of other players from across the continent lured by the yuan, does Conte see China as a threat to the world dominance of the Premier League? "Yes, I have seen this in the past," said the Italian. "Also in my squad. Oscar plays with us, then a good offer from Chelsea comes and he went. "But I don't see a threat for my players. I think we are a great club and it's an honour to play for Chelsea. "I understand about the money. When you play for a team like Chelsea, you must be pleased. "The Premier League is really competitive. Every player wants to come to this league to play. It's the best in the world. For this reason, this offer I don't think is a threat for our league."

Keen to steer away from any potential Costa-related questions, Conte returned to the football and the fact Chelsea are seven points clear of their closest challengers. Of the win at Leicester, he said: "It was a good reaction (to the Spurs defeat). When you win 11 games in a row and then arrive at the moment to touch a defeat, and then to restart, it is not easy. I know from when I was a footballer, I understand this psychological aspect is very important. We have started very well in the FA Cup and now in the league. "Leicester were very tough, with good players and a good manager. To come here and to win is not easy, so I'm pleased." Chelsea signed striker N'Golo Kante in the summer for £30 million and the Chelsea boss agreed the dynamic midfielder is one of the most influential players in the Premier League. "I think N'Golo, for sure, is a very good player," said Conte. "He arrived at Chelsea and is playing very well. Don't forget that it is not easy when you change teams and arrive in a great team where expectations are very high. Sometimes the player can suffer from the pressure and not perform in the right way. But N'Golo has shown great personality and quality. I'm pleased to have him in my squad."

Two players suffering at present are Batshuayi and Ruben Loftus-Cheek. But Conte remains optimistic about the pair – in public at least. "Batshuayi and Ruben are two players in my squad," he said. "I trust in all my players. Ruben, for sure, is a player with great quality. Now that Oscar has left, he might have the right space to show me and the club his potential. "And for Michy to continue to work in this way, to show me that they deserve to play. I have no problem to play a young player."

Meanwhile, goalkeeper Thibaut Courtois is a very happy stopper at the moment. Originally signed from Belgian club Genk for £5 million in 2010, the 24-year-old keeper has more than repaid Chelsea in loan fees generated by his successful extended spells in Spain with Atletico Madrid. He is Mr Calm in front of the back five. Nothing seems to faze him, even the prospect of losing Costa to China. Chelsea have won twice this season without their leading marksman. Courtois said: "Diego didn't train since Tuesday and the manager had a plan in his head. We trained very well and we knew what to do. We played the same against AFC Bournemouth as well."

Fulham do it Barca-style

By Paul Lagan

FULHAM go into Saturday's televised West London derby clash at Queens Park Rangers (12.30pm) in buoyant mood after a sturdy 2-0 win over Barnsley that propelled them to eighth place in the Championship.

Having won six of their last eight matches and lost just once, Whites are six points off the play-off places with a game in hand.

Chris Martin has swiftly gone from zeroes to heroes at Craven Cottage, where he marked his return to the side by setting Fulham on the way to Saturday's win against Barnsley with a coolly converted penalty on the stroke of half-time, before setting up the other goal for Scott Malone, the left-back netting with a delightful far-post volley 10 minutes after the break.

It was the perfect all-round centre-forward's performance to suggest that Martin has now accepted that his immediate future lies in SW6, not back at Derby County.

As reported last week, Martin had hoped to terminate his season-long loan agreement with Fulham and return to Pride Park, where Rams' manager Steve McClaren was keen to accommodate his talents.

This came after it emerged that Martin and his agent had been rebuffed in their attempts to prise a pay increase from the Fulham hierarchy. It is claimed that when he joined Whites at the start of the season, Martin's wages increased from £14,000 to £17,000 a week. But it's alleged the player and his representative wanted Fulham to cough up £28,000 a week to keep him in West London.

Martin's omission was all the more galling as he was sealed when Derby refused to meet Fulham's asking price to terminate the loan agreement – and, instead, signed striker David Nugent from Middlesbrough.

Maybe Martin felt he had a point to prove on Saturday, if he did it with aplomb, spearheading a swashbuckling Fulham side that produced their most accomplished performance of the season in a game they could have won by a cricket score.

Heed what Slavisa Jokanovic said: "He played for his team against us. He wanted to play for Fulham. Everyone knows how important he is for us. We are trying to convince him to stay with us."

"Today he had a good performance and we are happy that he is back. I don't know why people ask me about Chris Martin so much, this is not his game for Fulham. I did not expect to play for us, he is a professional footballer. He was a bit confused with the situation and now he has a clear mind. "I expect him to play a big part in the future as well. This is the best situation for him and player. He made it clear he will be with us until the end of the season on Saturday."

Talk of Fulham becoming the Barcelona of the Championship may be fanciful but there is no doubt that Martin, with his Decorum in his form, they have the ability to make the play-offs. "I am proud of my players for today's performance," Jokanovic said. "We created..."
